

room that these Indian children will become at all familiar with any of these nobler things.

We all know that children are naturally dramatic, in fact, intensely so, and we should keep this in mind in all of our teaching, but especially so in our English and language work.

To some, this may seem very much like "all games," but no child, whether white or Indian, will progress much unless relieved of the book study. At the close of this work, most children will have a fair speaking knowledge of the English language.
