

to her husband, Charboneau.

It seems that Charboneau himself in his old age died on a journey toward Great Salt Lake, where the Indians, according to their custom, burned all the valuable papers he had carried for so many years. Those who knew her report Sacajawea as short and small, lively and spry to the last, dying when about 94 years old. She was often seen carrying bundles of faggots on her back to her tepee, a typical, energetic, industrious Indian grandmother.

At the grave of Sacajawea, on Wind River, Wyoming, the Daughters of the American Revolution have recently erected a concrete monument with a brass plate bearing the inscription, "Sacajawea, died April 9, 1884. A guide with the Lewis and Clark expedition, 1804-1808. Identified by Rev. J. Roberts, who officiated at her burial." H. E. Wadsworth, the United States Indian agent to the Shoshones at that time, is now stationed at Chemawa and is familiar with these facts.

The Daughters of the American Revolution of Montana have recently marked several spots made famous by Sacajawea and are discussing a bronze statue. Last Fall a splendid Lewis and Clark pageant was staged by the Daughters at Armstead, Mont., at the unveiling of a bronze tablet given by Senator Clark. Every character in the expedition was personified, with Sacajawea for the heroine. The Governor and other notables co-operated and the Oregon Short Line Railroad prepared a site for the monument at an expense of more than $1000, grading and filling in cement for the walls and a cement foundation near their station at Armstead, the spot where the expedition met Sacajawea's brother, Chief Cameahwait. The Butte Tombstone Company presented a huge boulder, that was also transported free of charge, and excursions ran from Butte, Dillion and other neighboring cities. During the exercises one lady in Indian costume sang the "Sacajawea Lullaby," composed by Miss Zillah Harris, daughter of Mrs. Nathan Harris, of Portland, Or.

Another statue of Sacajawea by the sculptor, Leonard Crunelle, has been erected by the women and children of North Dakota on the capitol grounds at Bismark. This, with the one designed by Alice Cooper and erected by the women of the Northwest at Portland, makes three statues of Sacajawea, and others are under consideration.

REVERT TO CANNIBALISM

Of all abhorrent conditions of the human mind to us cannibalism seem the worst. In enlightened America such a thing is impossible and it would seem that any-one who had at any time lived here would be in
