A balloon ascension was scheduled in The Dalles for this afternoon. These sort of events invariably draw the largest crowds of people. And yet there is no scientific principle involved other than the simple law discovered by Newton, now so plentifully apparent in the falling leaf. There is still less of amusement about it. The magic lantern and panorama of childhood is far its superior. What then, constitutes its interest, in that gaping crowds will follow the aeronaut in his wild flight into space, bending their necks until it would seem the cord would snap from weariness? The answer cannot be guessed, unless there is a delight in the fascination of possible impending death. The night of a human being falling through space with ever increasing veless, bleeding mass, would indeed be a the misfortune that sooner or later overtakes all balloonists obviated.
