LAND AT THE NORTH POLE. Evidences of It Traccable in the Icebergs

of the Arctic Occus-There is no reasonable doubt that there exists in the Arctic ocean, somewhere in the vicinity of the north pole, an ice-covered land of considerable extent. This is evident from the characas there are different kinds of coal. The difference between the floeberg, or palneocrystic iceberg, and the ordinary iceberg of the north Atlantic, says a scientific exchange, is as great and as easily distinguishable as is the difference between a block of bituminous eoal and one of anthracite. The floe-berg is distinguished by its tabular form, great uniformity of height, rectanguar shape nearly flat surface, perpendicular cliffs, and especially from its laminated structure. Whenever a palaeogystic leeberg is seen in the far north, before its face has suffered much from the melting action of the sun, a cape close observer notes that it presents along its front a series of faint blue lines, separated by interspaces of opaque white. These lines show a a stratification due to yearly accumulations of snow upon a nearly level surface, which are transformed gradually into ice, and each line also represents the limit of the accumulation of a single year. In a similar manner are formed the glaciers of the Alps and Greenland but these latter ice-sheets are torn distorted and reformed a thousand times in their descent down rapid slopes and through confining valleys of greater or less width. Floebergs, then, are parts of great ice sheets which, formed from successive snowfalls over a land area of no great elevation and very gentle gradients, flow downward of least resistance. The slope being gentle, the ice moves gradually seaward, with its structure unchanged and its stratification unbroken, and passes slowly into the ocean, whence
