TURNING GRAY AND THREATENED

WITH BALDNESS

The Danger is Averted by Using

YER'S HAIR

"Nearly forty years ago, after some weeks of sickness, my hair turned gray and began falling out so rapidly that I was threatened with immediate baldness. Hearing Ayer's Hair Vigor highly spoken of, I commenced using this preparation, and was so well satisfied with the result that I have never tried any other kind of dressing. It stopped the hair from falling out, stimulated a new growth of hair, and kept the scalp free from dandruff. Only an occasional application is now needed to keep my hair of good, natural color. I never hesitate to recommend any of Ayer's medicines tomy friends."-Mrs. H. M. HAIGHT,

ABOUT AMBERGRIS.

The Nauseous Whale Product from Which Come Delicate Perfumes.

Exceedingly Valuable Because Rare-Found Only in Diseased Whales—It Sells for $30 an Ounce-Most of It Goes to French Perfumers.

What is ambergris? In the "Arabian Nights" we are told of eastern beauties whose cheeks were marked with moles like bits of ambergris; and in the story of the sixth voyage of "Sinbad the Sailor" we read in the description of the place where the voyagers were wrecked: "Here is also a fountain of pitch and bitumen that runs into the sea, which the fishes swallow and then vomit it up again, turned into ambergris!" That antique author, Robert Boyle, considered it to be of vegetable production and similar to yellow amber; thus it received its name, ambergris (gray)-gray amber.

This and other even more plausible theories are but indeed fallacies that puzzled savants have set forth when they were at a loss to account for its origin. It is now ascertained beyond a doubt to be generated by the largeheaded sperm whale and is the result of a diseased state of the animal. The victim of this rare malady may possibly throw off the morbific substance; or finally die of the ailment. The disease is located in the intestinal canal, and some savants suppose it to be caused by a biliary irritation. After a deep study on the subject several modern scientists have agreed that the disorder is akin to that now fashionable human peril, appendicitis, intensified and prolonged in this great mammal, yet that dread ailment that has but lately been understood by the surgeons and medical men of the world.

It is known that the ambergris whale feeds upon the cuttle fish. This creature is armed on its head with a sharppointed, curved black horn resembling a bird's beak, much like that of a parrot, only the lower mandible is the larger. This is found-as it is too indestructible to be digested in many specimens of ambergr's, and may oftentimes aid in establishing a seated disense. It may be considered though to be but the primary cause of irritation, as much of the finest ambergris is entirely free from the tough little horns. Such is the effect in the whale of the magnified-and tremendously magnified-illness which, when established in our own comparatively puny organism, causes an instant and fatal collapse unless quickly and heroically attacked by the skill of the surgeon. The habits of the great water mammals, however, tend to prolong life, and their resisting power against this and their resisting power against this insidious destroyer is cloquent of their tenacious hold on existence. To the conservative whale fisher of New Bedford or Provincetown, the discovery of ambergris is as unexpected and as longed-for as the sheeny splendor of the pearl that gladdens the pearlfisher. Almost awe-stricken are the saliors when the cry of "ambergris" is uttered. This is the happy event of a The purest Wines lifetime. The substance is carefully taken from the bowels of the whale and liquors is packed in casks, if it is in liquid form, or in sacks, if it is dry enough.

It is then brought direct to Boston, where it is appraised by the head of the largest wholesale drug firm in the city. This young man has no enviable task before him in ascertaining the value of the article. He has to examine the fetid mass, which is sometimes of a rank liquid state, sometimes of the consistency of soft putty, and again, a chalklike substance. That which is more like putty usually is to be relied on for making the best market ambergers, and gradually, as it dries, the only curing process it undergees, the unwholesome dark shade gradually turns to a soft squirrel gray. The substance lightens in weight and the fascinating odor develops an odor almost indescribable, like the blending of new-mown hay, the damp woody fragrance of a fern copse, and the faintest possible perfume of the violet.

And to what use is ambergris put? It is an indispensable article with fine perfumers, as it is used to give permanency and lasting qualities to very fleeting scents. It is a curious fact that the keynote or basis of "nosegnys" or "bouquets," as handkerchief gays" or "bouquets," as handkerchief odors are called, is not, as one might suppose, the attar of garden flowers, neither the penetrating balsams. These are indispensable, but are not the groundwork. That basis is always one of the four animal odors, i. c., ambergris musk, obtained from small musk deer of Asia; civet, from the civet cat of India, and castor, a secretion of the easter beaver, and now almost obsolete in the perfume trade. The pure and separate tincture of any one of these odors is too intense and powerful to be tolerated. Like all substances of these kinds, it must undergo a slow decomposition, till the remainders possess very little volatility. Even then they contain a virtue which clings pertinaciously to woven fabrics, and not being soluble in weak alkaline lyes is still to be detected in the material, after passing through the severest lavatory ordeal. They are, therefore, of great value to the perfumer, and are the essential foundation in almost every formula. As ambergris is the most costly of the animal perfumes, the bouquets containing it are of the most expensive kinds. It is used more in France than in this country, civet being extensively used for a retainer in American-made perfumes. Most of the ambergris is shipped, therefore, to France, where it finds a ready demand .- St. Louis Globe-Democrat.
