MOSSBACK HAS A DREAM.
Pleasure Turns to Despair, but He Awoke in Time.
VICTOR, Or., Sept. 28, 1896.
MISTER EDITOR:—I have been a regular subscriber to your paper every since it started and always liked it first rate, till this silver question came up. Then for sure I didn't like it a bit. You see, when they first begun to talk free silver, it stuck me just where I lived. At least I thought it did. You see I have always found silver a mighty good money. I never could get half enough of it. So it just seemed to me that if they would just go ahead and make it free I'd be the happiest man alive, but that's all changed now. I've had a vision—a real vision. It came about this way. I put in the day last Wednesday diggin' taters, worked from daylight 'till dusk as hard as ever I could, ate a big mess of salmon for supper, then went to bed; but instead of sleeping I dreamed. I'd been thinking about silver all day, so I dreamed about taters and silver all night. I dreamed that there was a very tall smooth-looking man came along and offered to buy my taters. Said he would give me a dollar a bushel if I'd take the money he had, so I axed him what kind of money he had. He said, real pleasant like, I have some notes of hand due, one day after date, and signed by Col. Sinnott, of The Dalles, Or. Now I've known the colonel for a long time, but I didn't know that he ever gave his note. Still I thought that this is all right. Jud sent this fellow out to by truck for the hotel and didn't want to send the money by this chap. So I spoke up and said: "All right, mister, I'll take the notes. They are as good as gold to me. How many taters do you want?" He said he'd take all I had. So me and the boys lit into 'weighin' em as fast as we could, while the tall man sat there on the fence keepin' tally. When we got through he counted it up and there were sixty bushels. So he put his brand on the sacks and handed me twelve $5 notes, each signed by Col. Sinnott. My, didn't I feel rich. Wonder I didn't wake up, I felt so good; but I didn't, I dreamed on. Dreamed that I went to The Dalles next day and took the notes to Colonel to cash. When I got to the Umatilla house it seemed to me that everything looked kinder disordered and broke up like. After waitin' a good while the colonel came in, shuk hands as usual, but I noticed that he looked kinder disturbed like. After exchangin' the time of day, etc., I mentioned the notes and later deal, thankin' him for the good price I had received. But he stopped me short off and said: "My friend you have made a sad mistake. Those notes are not worth the paper they are written on. I am bankrupt." Now I've known the Colonel long enough to know that he can joke when he wants to, so I laughed and said: "That's all right, lets go and take a little wine." "Hold on," says the Colonel, "you mistake, I am serious. I haven't a cent to my name." I saw from his looks that he was in earnest, so without my asking he told me all about it. Says he: "You remember that historical fish story of mine?" "Oh yes," says I. "Well," says he, "I told it one time to my sorrow, yes, I may say, to my utter ruin. When Bryan was through here two years ago I told it to him. His admirers here have felt pretty sore about it for some time and finally induced the city council to pass an ordinance compelling me to sign $5 notes due one day after date to whosoever could furnish the paper, and to continue signing as long as paper could be secured. The upshot of the whole matter was, Jacoben landed here the day after the ordinance passed with about a ton of paper all filled out with my signature. I redeemed them as long as my wealth lasted. You are too late." I tried to offer some consolation, but failed. Says I: "Colonel, seems to me the council have treated you very un-fairly." "Yes," says he, "so they have. Still you silver lunatics propose to give Uncle Sam a dose of the same kind of medicine." Just then the old woman nudged me in the ribs, and said: "Wake up John, it's gittin' daylight and I do believe them taters you dug yesterday got frost bit last night." "Taters be dinged," says I. But then I got up right quick and made the fire, while the old woman growled about the taters being left uncovered over night. But say, Mister Editor, I'm done with free silver. That dream opened my eyes. How is Uncle Sam goin' to make all of the silver dollars as good as gold unless he has the power to say how many to make. You were all right at first, Mister Editor, only I was too punkin'-headed to see it. Send the paper right along to yours truly, "MOSSBACK."

First Lady to Make the Trip.
F. H. Kearney and wife have returned from a bicycle tour, which gained for Mrs. Kearney the distinction of being the first lady who has ever ridden across the sand wastes between Pendleton and The Dalles. It was all due to her own ingenuity that she was enabled to make the trip easily and arrived in The Dalles not much fatigued. Mr. and Mrs. Kearney left Pendleton a month ago and arrived home a few days ago. They rode 800 miles on their wheels. From The Dalles they went to Portland on the boat and then took wheels again for a tour through the valley, visiting Salem and several towns along the road. On the way to The Dalles, Mrs. Kearney noticed that the tires of her bicycle cut into the sand so as to make it probable that she could not stand the trip. She suggested to Mr. Kearney that some of the wind be let out of the tires, and after a little experimentation, both adopted the expedient and with "flat tires" and wheels running almost on their rims they made the journey over the sand desert with ease and speed.—East Oregonian.

A Lecture to Parents.
The lecture last evening by Rev. Parker was attended by a large audience, in the main youthful and of the gentler sex. It would have been more fitting had there been more parents in attendance, for the lecture was directed to them; but as a large proportion of the attendance who, if they are not, will most probably be parents some time, they will remember the wise precepts they have heard and turn them to advantage in the future. The labor of Mr. Parker is purely philanthropic, and is calculated to make better men and women of the little ones now growing up around us. In his opening remarks he stated that the work was an old one, as old as the public school itself.
The true mother is the one who rears the child and guides its mental development with unflinching care. He has decided the old question as to which is the mother of the chick, the hen which lays the egg, or the hen which hatches it, in favor of the latter. She it is who cares for it, feeds it, and watches over it until it is able to care for itself. The same rule applies to the human mother, and there is a distinction between offspring and children. He had known mothers who administered an opiate to make their babe sleep till morning so that they might spend a social evening away from home, unencumbered by it. With rare beauty of language he pictured the delight of the young mother who, in the joy of seeing her first born smile up into her face for the first time, calls quickly to her husband: "John, John, the baby can talk!"
He paid a high tribute to our public schools, calling them the bulwark of our liberties, and urged his hearers to preserve them as the most important institution of this land. He finds that seventy-five per cent of the insane are illiterate, and only four per cent of the criminals have a high school education. The greatest source of crime is parental neglect. It has been said that whenever you build a school you close a prison. He has decided that the work of the teacher is more important than that of the minister, for two excellent reasons. He has but fifty-two hours each year to inculcate morals and education, while the teacher has 1400. Then the minister talks to those whose minds have become set and calloused, while the teacher's audience have plastic minds that receive and retain the minutest impression. It is therefore important that the teacher have a good moral character, and he believes parents should always be vigilant over teachers, and if one is discovered who lacks in this requirement to at once make it known to the proper authority. From this on he pursued the central thought of his lecture, the relation of the parent to the teacher's work, and urged that the parent should work more in harmony with the teacher, not always to take the child's view of the case when it has been chastised, and to talk over the faults or virtues and make known to the teacher, as far as possible, the child's characteristics; to sometimes visit the school; and to frequently speak encouraging words to the teacher, who really has more time in hand to spend upon the children, than the mother herself, sleep and play subtracted. The lecture was interspersed with wit and readily adapted himself to the good graces of the audience, who learned lessons they will always remember.

Two beautiful duets were sung, one by Misses Ethel Deming and Elizabeth Bonn, and one by Bess Rowland and Elizabeth Bonn.
