In the center of this cave flows a stream of clear water, which contains numerous small, eveless fish. A number of them were caught and placed on exhibition here, but they lived only a few days. The depth of the stream is from 20 to 30 feet. About two miles from the entrance it empties into a large lake, which varies in depth from five to 40 feet and lies beneath a ceiling about 100 feet from its surface. Recently an exploring party had a small boat made and attempted to cross this lake, but after going nearly half a mile from shore decided to return. There are a great many crevices in the rocks, and if was in some of these that he skeletons of wild animals were found, supposed to be those of the wolf. Snakes of all kinds make this cave their home in winter .- Chicago News,
