POSTAGE PORTRAITS. The Shasta Route Put in Use. The Faces of Child Monarchs Grac a Number of Foreign Stamps -Some valuable Specimens.

Among the new postage stamps which are destined to be very popular-aside from their commercial value-is one of the princess of Wales, the first time the features of this royal lady have been designed in this way. The compliment is paid her by one of the royal English colonies, Newfoundland, and the United States has a finger in the ple, as the beautifully engraved pink stamp was made by the Banknote Engraving company of New York. An earlier issue includes the prince of Wales, in the same pleasing color, and his portrait and that of the princess form companion stamps of the requisite value to carry a letter to any part of Europe or America, his being a two-cent stamp. while that of her royal highness, his wife, is a three-cent stamp, the combination making the necessary five-cent postage.

Sut there are others, and among these is the new stamp portrait of the queen of England, as she looks now in her dignified age, and in her widow's cap; a one-cent green stamp, also is sued by Newfoundland, and with it an other and younger scion of the royal family makes his bow to an admiring public from the face of a lavender stamp, the little son of the duke of York, and the heir apparent to the British throne. Before me as I write is a letter from the general post office Newfoundland, registered, and post paid, with a one-cent green Victoria stamp, two 1%-cent stamps of her little great-grandson, the small duke of York, and a pink three-cent stamp of her gracious majesty's daughter-in-law, the princess of Wales. Quite a family gathering for the conveyance of one letter, and a unique feature of postage portraiture, not surpassed The Dalles, Portland and Astoria in any age or country.

Children's faces are not unknown on stamps, the little queen of Holland, as her Dutch majesty has been called un til recently, being a familiar sight to her subjects on the postage stamps of the Netherlands. But the little queen has shot up into womanhood, and her childish pictures, representing a little girl with flowing hair and straight bangs, are not representative of a crowned queen, so she will have a new postage stamp made-indeed, has already done so, but withdrew it from irculation because she did not like either the expression or the pose. Anyone who has received one of these for bidden stamps can sell it for three dollars. In a few years it will be price-

Little Wilhelmina was not the only royal child on a postage stamp-there is the boy king of Spain, Alfonso XIII. and there was a stamp bearing the im age of the young king of Siam. I do not recall any other postage likenesses of little kings and queens, but may have overlooked some. In these instances the portraiture was not restricted to postage stamps, but apperaed also on the coin of the realm. Perhaps a good reason why no image of
