HE WAS DECIDEDLY IN IT.

Why a Dalles Young Man Missed the Celebration. When the cars came in from the East on the evening before the Fourth, they showed evidences of the dusty condition of the up-river country. In fact the seats looked like a town lot in Biggs and the windows were as dirty as a Montana election. The cars were crowded with misguided patriots bound for Astoria, to get a day's rest and a glimpse of the "blue briny." When he (no matter who) entered the cars at The Dalles, he found every seat occupied by two persons, that is, all except one. That seat contained, besides a lone female of a certain age, a pasteboard box, the newspaper covering it permitting a bit of snowy tablecloth to show around its bulging edges. Its lunch-grass fatness indicated that the lone female had proposed, in time of peace, to make war on some patriotic citizen should she be fortunate enough to get him corralled on top of a Clatsop county kopje. "He," the tourist from The Dalles, was dressed in a suit of light-colored goods, with a dapper linen hat (cost 25c) and wore besides a gaudy necktie, a smile appropriate to the point of visit—the mouth of the Columbia river. He passed in the aisle opposite the pasteboard box of the lone female aforesaid and gazed longingly at it. He wanted to take its place, not on account of its proximity to the "moire antique" daisies but to give his feet, which were protesting against the six: of his shoes, a much-needed rest. The female gave him one glance, and not being pleased with his style of beauty (it was an odd size) gave him also a steady view of her back hair, while she admired the ever-changing scenery of the grand old Columbia. Seeing no chance of getting the seat, he turned his back on both basket and its owner and rested his frame on the arm of the seat; but he did not rest long. As the cars swept around a curve, obeying the law of centrifugal force, he started to describe a tangent, but the attraction of gravitation acting at the same time caused him to describe a parabola and land right side up squarely on the summit of the pasteboard box. There was a gentle yielding of the paper, a silent but effective "squash," and he was in it with remarkable neatness and considerable dispatch. There was a mingling of custard, mustard, cream, lemon pie, cake, pickles, sandwiches, chicken, hard-boiled eggs, napkins, vinegar, salad, sugar, profanity, tears and preserved fruit. As he extricated himself from the wreckage, a smashed jar of strawberries sent its red juices soaking through the tablecloth, a silent but startling witness to the deadly stab he had given the combination. It seemed indeed the blood of his innocent victim crying aloud to its owner to avenge its premature, unexpected and inglorious destruction. But why prolong the dreadful tale? He made a sneak for the smoker, brake-beam or anywhere he could get, so it was far, far away from where he was. As he left the car there were titters and giggles, mingled with ill-timed comments and unseemly jests. On his new trousers were the accusing stains of murder. He left the train at the Cascade Locks and came home on the midnight train. He did not see Astoria and the sounding sea. He missed the fireworks, the pink parasols and lemonade, the merry-go-round and the lurid oratory. And besides all this the box contained a three-tined fork that was placed handle down. He didn't see it, but he knows it was there. And here endeth the first lesson. Allowed at the July Term.
