TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1909.

With no fault whatever of the paper or any one connected with it, The Evening News has been badly handicapped nearly the entire day. It has been without electric or water power, through the failure of the Electric Light and Water Company to supply the same, and during that time there was no running of the Linotype machine, or newspaper press possible. This accounts for the excuse for an evening paper that is given The News' readers this afternoon. The great freshet in the river, which the company named is unable to cope with is alone to blame for failure to supply the power needed by The Evening News' office, and it is indeed fortunate this establishment has been able to get out any kind of an issue.

THE NEW ORCHARD

Address Interesting to the Citizens of Douglas.

Following is the substance of a lecture delivered at Portland a few days since on the interesting subject, "The Beginning of a New Orchard." The discourse is well identified to Douglas county's interests. It is in part as follows:

Care Main Essential.
"As in business, success in apple-growing and attaining satisfactory results depends on getting started in the right," said Professor Cole. "More failures in orcharding may be attributed to the lack of care in selecting a location for an orchard and the trees to be planted than all other causes combined. The first thing to be considered in planting an apple orchard is the selection of a locality with the right kind of soil which is adapted to apple-growing. Climatic conditions should first be studied and that location selected for the orchard which will insure sunshine for coloring the fruit as well as the proper amount of moisture for developing its flavor. Localities subject to late spring and early fall frosts should not be selected. Extreme lowland should be avoided for that reason. An orchard should preferably be located at an elevation of not less than 100 to 200 feet and on the northeast slope of a hill for protection from our southwest winds.

Close Transportation Counts.
"For the orchardist to get the best results, his orchard should not be located more than six miles from the railroad or other transportation agency for the double reason that to haul his product a greater distance lessens its market value and because of the better transportation facilities the more easily it is for him to market his product."

Professor Cole pointed out that a water drainage and the condition of the soil are other essentials to successful orcharding. The soil, said the lecturer, should not be less than four feet deep, providing a good bed in which to grow roots. As to the preparation of land for an orchard, Prof. Cole said the tract should be thoroughly worked at least one year, preferably for two seasons, by growing some highly cultivated crop so that it would be in the best possible condition for receiving trees. This condition, he emphasized, was of greatest importance for the reason that the the first year's growth of a fruit tree had everything to do both with the life of the tree and its productiveness.

Two Varieties Enough.
As to the variety to be planted," continued Professor Cole, "set out only that variety or varieties that are best suited to the locality in which your orchard is situated. That can be determined from your own observation. Don't get too many varieties. Two varieties are enough for any ten acre orchard. To insure thorough pollination, I would suggest the planting of Spitzenberg and Newtowns, alternating with four rows of each for the entire length of the orchard."

"In setting out a commercial orchard, plant only one-year old budded trees. In doing so you will have a 3-year old root system of sufficient strength to bring the tree out. Do not plant grafted trees. I have no recommendation to make as to the setting out the trees, whether the squares, hexagonal or triangular plan be followed. Trees should be planted 35 feet apart, leaving room for the spraying machine to pass between the rows.

Fall Planting Best.
"Where the climate is not too severe, I would advise planting trees in the Fall, for the reason that trees so planted get the advantage of an additional growth they do not get in the Spring and as a result, through this root growth, begin to establish themselves in the soil. An orchard should be cultivated every ten days. For the first few years, after an orchard has been set out and until the trees attain their growth and begin to produce, strawberries, potatoes of other vegetables may be grown between the rows of trees. But do not sow wheat or grass in a young orchard.

Peach trees may also be planted in a growing apple orchard, but I would advise any orchardist not to introduce peach trees among his apples unless he has the nerve to cut out the filters when the apple trees come into bearing."
