A scene took place at the Oregon restaurant shortly after 6 o'clock Saturday evening, when two bricklayers, apparently endeavoring to follow the customs of those well known personages, "Alfonso" and "Gaston," engaged in a fist fight with the result that the smaller member of the pair received a blow over the head with a beer bottle which brought him to the floor. As soon as the men were detected in the act of causing a rough house the police were summoned, and it was but a short time until Captain Knauss had them safely locked in jail. Concurring with the request of the "short" man, the prisoners were separated and placed in different cells where they remained unmolested until this morning. From what can be learned of the fracas the men entered the restaurant at about 5 o'clock on the evening in question and upon ordering a limited supply of rations engaged in an altercation as to who was to foot the bill. Unlike many instances of this nature, each party wanted to pay the costs, insisting that the other keep his money intact. One word brought on another, and finally the "taller" man is said to have picked up a bottle and landed his companion a severe blow on the head. With a yell, likened to that of an Indian on the warpath, the dazed man started for the door, but to no avail, he was overtaken by the aggressor and accorded additional punishment. When arrested the men appeared indifferent, simply informing the arresting officer that they were good fellows and would soon be freed from their seclusion.
