Farmers Has Something To Say Regarding Market for Produce.

Editor News: In a recent number of The News, Mr. Axel, of Grants Pass, had an interview in which he advises the farmers of Douglas county to raise more produce. While the farmers of this section may make money raising general crops, it is a notorious fact that in Douglas county it does not pay the average farmer to raise anything of that nature except for his own consumption, because of the fact that there is no local market for such edibles. If Roseburg had a commission house where such produce could be handled for the Portland market and where the grower would be certain of a fair price for his labor, I venture to say that Douglas county would soon double her population. As it is, it is almost impossible to dispose of produce, except in very small quantities, and then the local grocery men seem to think they are doing you a favor to take small truck off your hands—in trade, at that. Last spring one of my neighbors took to Roseburg four sacks of green peas and was unable to dispose of more than one of them notwithstanding the fact that two of the stores had only a quart each on hand. The same thing is true of spring chickens and all other small products of the farm. Another neighbor last spring took to Roseburg two sacks of early potatoes and had to give one sack away to a friend or bring it back home. The trouble is that the country around about Roseburg has grown faster than the city in the latter's ability to consume what the former can produce, and I am positive that there will be no material advancement of the country surrounding the city until such time shall arrive that a waiting market can be assured the farmer for everything he can raise.

Some where in the state there must be people who need what the Douglas county farmers can raise, and it is only a question of bringing the producer and consumer together, and in my notion the surest way to accomplish that object is to induce some commission house in Portland to open a branch house in Roseburg, and I think that could be done. We have hundreds of acres of bottom land which could be easily irrigated and which would grow beautiful celery as well as other crops of a like nature. But comparatively few growers care to take the risk of raising such crops and of shipping them at their own risk, but if a local market was assured them, they would undoubtedly get busy. We all know that thousands of crates of logan and other berries go to waste in the county on account of poor market facilities.

The News has recently been advocating a public market for the mutual benefit of the producer and consumer, and while that would to some extent create a market, in the opinion of the writer it would not materially increase the output of produce for the section, because of the fact, as I said before, the local market is limited in its capacity to consume, while there is hardly a limit to the amount of general farm products the county could produce provided there was a stable market where the grower was certain of obtaining cash for his labor. It seems to me that this would be a matter that could profitably be considered by the commercial club in its endeavors to make Roseburg and vicinity a commercial center. Land that is adapted to vegetable growing is not, as a rule, the best for fruit, and there are hundreds of acres of rich land that would bring thousands of dollars annually to the county if worked to their limit in producing garden truck for the outside market.
