Securing a description of the alleged hold-up man, the officers started in the direction of the jungles, and upon reaching a point below Dysinger's mill accosted a transient, who, from appearances, had no specific destination in view.

The fellow was immediately recognized by the officers as the man who had been taken in custody a short time after the arrival of train No. 16, and later made his escape. At that time he was pointed out to Night Officer Chambers by a brakeman, who chanced to notice him perched between the locomotive and the baggage car. Chambers effected the man's arrest, and upon escorting him to a point near the conductors room, left him standing outside while he went within to converse with the brakeman. When he returned, the transient had flown, and a half hour's search failed to divulge his whereabouts.

Brooks apparently did not stop to argue the question, but on the contrary took to his heels and ran.

When questioned following his arrest, the transient gave his name as Frank Aldrich, and informed the officers that he was recently released from a detention home in California. He said he was 16 years of age, and denied that he intended to engineer a hold-up as alleged. On the contrary he said he had a "flash light", which he desired to sell in order to obtain money with which to secure a bed.

Brooks spent some time with the prisoner this morning, and it is not sprobable that he will prosecute. In fact, he seems to entertain pity for the lad, who, from appearances, has seen better days.
