Facing Death For Love

By ARTHUR W. BREWSTER

There is an island in the Pacific ocean which produces tropical fruit in abundance, and ships stop there to take it away and leave its equivalent in money or in such goods as the natives require. But the islanders will not consent to any mingling with the whites and are especially jealous of their women. Death is the penalty to any woman who receives a white man for a lover or a husband.

One day an American ship named the Mary Boyle stopped at the island with a cargo of miscellaneous goods which she unloaded and took on in its place such fruits as the place produced. The crew of the Mary Boyle were permitted to remain ashore during the day, but at evening they were required to go aboard the ship.

The captain of the Mary Boyle had warned his sailors to have nothing to do with the women on the island, telling them that they would not only endanger their lives, but bring certain death on any woman to whom they made love. The warning was not necessary with regard to the women, as a whole, who were many of them hideous. Even the girls were not gifted with what a white man would consider beauty. There was, however, one exception. While the shore force was unloading on the beach several girls came down to bathe. They went into the water and sported like dolphins. One of them who swam about, her long black hair trailing behind her, was as graceful as a swan. The sun glistened on some brass bracelets she wore on her arm and sparkled on a stone that was fixed just above her forehead to a ribbon bound around her head.

In contrast with this dusky maiden was one of the sailors whose eye she caught, Jack Cogan by name, with light hair and blue eyes. He followed her with his gaze so fixedly wherever she swam that the mate in charge of the party noticed his attraction, and to nip it in the bud gruffly ordered him to attend to his work.

When the girls were tired of swimming they went ashore, passing near the sailors at work, and the dark beauty, glancing at Jack, saw him gazing at her rapturously. Love is like gunpowder that only a spark is required to explode. The girl saw not only what to her was exquisite beauty in the fair young sailor, but the love light in his eyes. She passed on with her companions, but the damage had been done. One exchange of glances brought about that which was ready to brave death.

A week later, when the Mary Boyle was about ready to set up her anchor and sail away, the captain, in order to make sure that all the crew were aboard, ordered the boatswain to call the roll. When he came to the name of Cogan there was no reply. The captain's brow lowered. He shrunk from leaving any of his men behind and feared that Jack had in some way become involved, so that it would be impossible to extricate him. Night was coming on when no white man was permitted to be on the island. If Jack was found there he would be killed. Yet the captain dare not violate the custom of the islanders by sending a crew ashore to bring him aboard. The only course to pursue was to wait till morning.

Dawn was breaking when the watch reported that a canoe with a white man and a native woman in it was leaving the shore. The captain ran up on deck, and seizing a glass brought it to bear on the couple in the boat. The wind was high and blowing on shore, giving rise to a line of breakers, but the occupants of the canoe, by dexterous paddling, the woman in the bow evidently taking the lead, had managed to ride the foamy crests and get beyond them into unbroken water. At the moment the captain took the glass a number of natives ran from the wood above the beach and began hurling spears and stones at the couple in the boat.

It was clear to those on board the Mary Boyle that Love was playing one of his reckless pranks. These two young fools were braving almost certain death that they might possess each other.

The men ashore, seeing that they were powerless to reach the fugitives with their weapons, rushed up the beach to an inlet where was moored a canoe large enough to hold half a dozen of them, and, getting aboard, started in pursuit. Six paddles were far more effective than two, especially when one of the latter was handled by a girl, but she was both strong and skilful indeed, it was on her, rather than her lover, who was inexperienced in canoeing, that the race depended.

All the world loves a lover, and the crew of the Mary Boyle, without waiting for the captain's order, lowered a boat and pulled to the rescue. The fugitives saw them and took heart. It was a question whether the sailors or the islanders would reach them first. If the islanders, the fate of the girl was sealed, for they would kill her immediately.

The pursuing boat was near the fleeing couple. The girl's father was about to hurl a spear at her when a six pound shot from the Mary Boyle struck the canoe he was in and in the panic that ensued rolled it over. That ended the struggle. The fugitives were taken aboard, the anchor raised, and the ship sailed away.

As to the future life of the young couple there is no record.
