Afternoon Tea Etiquette.

The duties of a hostess should be added to the modern curriculum of education.

Have simple entertainments gone out of fashion, submerged in the tidal wave of extravagance?

There have been of late many references made to the king and queen of England having expressed their wish that afternoon tea, as a fashionable function, should be abolished as being an unnecessary and unhealthful custom. Whether the king and queen really did make such a statement and issue a royal command to that effect has not as yet been authoritatively made public, and in the meantime "5 o'clock teas" flourish apace both in England and in this country.

It is possible to give to this entertainment such distinctive originality to make of the simple request a suitable function to which invitations are eagerly sought, so that small wonder is it that women and men alike fall victims to its charms.

Every good housekeeper has some recipe that she guards with jealous care, and to be known as having the most delicious of cakes, biscuits or sandwiches at afternoon tea is every whit as desirable as in the olden days when every woman was taught the art of making cake. In all well appointed households the tea table is made ready at 5 o'clock, even though for the moment the hostess may not have returned from her afternoon drive. The tea service is set forth on a low tea table—in winter near the fire, in summer on the pleasantest corner of the veranda. Only the tea service is for the tea table. If there is a lower shelf the cups and saucers may be placed on it. A pile of small tea plates, each with its dainty tea napkin, occupies one shelf of the "craete's assistant," a three tier stand. On the remaining shelves are hot biscuits of diminutive size and small tea cakes and one large cake. All kinds of sandwiches, from the wafers thin bread and butter to the endless variety of tomato, lettuce, cream cheese and nut sandwiches, are included. Only these must not be too great a variety served the same time.

The hostess makes the tea. If the head of the house be at home it is her duty, but if she be not present then the eldest daughter takes her place at the tea table. The kettle must be boiling, then the teapot be warmed. A spoonful of tea for each guest and one for the teapot is the rule. A small quantity of the boiling water is then poured on the tea and stands for three minutes, and then the teapot is filled with boiling water. On the tea table must be cream, sugar, saffron and sliced lemon. In winter a small decanter of rum is also added. The camomile tea, so fashionable now, must not be forgotten, for it is said to have the most marvelous effect upon tired nerves and sleeplessness. It is brewed in the same fashion as other tea, and no tea table should be without it.

The older woman or the young girl of today who makes of the afternoon tea hour an entertainment in the best sense of the word for her friends finds nothing pays so well for the time and thought given it, while for the woman who from forced economy cannot give dinners and luncheons as she would there is nothing to take its place. And there is no time nor place where a woman is seen to such advantage. Attired in becoming gown in front of a fire with the tea table and tea service artistically arranged, she must shine as a hostess. And "May I bring an entertaining friend in for tea?" often introduces a stranger of note into the domain of the American home life in a way he could never have found through a normal dinner or dance.

All young girls should be instructed how to play hostess at the afternoon tea, should know how to make tea and if not, how to make the cakes and sandwiches and to tell how they should be made; to take interest in having the silver tea service kept in perfect condition and, above all, be taught how to make the guest feel he or she is welcome to the home life and not regarded as an outsider. And afternoon tea is possible even with the smallest of tables, for it can be most delightfully served in the house where but one maid or no maid at all is kept.

Visiting Cards For Young Women.

The cardboard now in use is of medium thickness. The very thin cards popular a little while ago had the advantage of taking up very little room in the cardcase and of weighing very little, but they were too easily bent.

Old English type and block letters are fashionable at the present moment. Script is now and always in good taste. Many people prefer it because it is simple and unostentatious and never goes out of fashion.

Old English is by far the most expensive style in the beginning, as complicated letters take more time to engrave than plain ones. Some stationers charge three times as much for it as for script, block type costing twice as much as the last named. The lettering should be of medium size, neither very large nor very small.

The card of a young single woman is smaller than that of a married woman and nearly square. Girls who are still at school may omit the "Miss." As soon as they graduate and prepare to assume the duties of grown persons they assume it.

Simple Financing.

"I hear you are going to get an auto."
"That's the talk."
"How can you afford it?"
"Family has agreed to go without better for a week."
