OCEAN INVADES THE TOWN

Italy alone is not the possessor of a Venice. Right here in our own country at Seabright, New Jersey, the streets are literally filled with water.

Seabright, became a veritable Venice when the terrible storm drove the waters of the Atlantic upon her. As seen in the photograph, boats were used for communication in the streets. In the background at the end of the street can be observed a house floating down the Shrewsbury river out to sea. The giant waves ate away the edge of the land, destroying hotels, magnificent residences with their fine lawns, and many miles of cement walks, before its fury was spent.

When the waters invaded Seabright, as shown above, it was that little city's second experience within a week. A week previous, a storm struck the city and did considerable property damage. The citizens soon recovered themselves and were industriously engaged in re-building the damaged sections when they received a second visitation.

H. Guest, the baker, today removed the awning formerly adorning the front of his store on Jackson street. He expects to purchase a new and modern awning at an early date in the spring.

George E. Cole, a farmer residing a few miles north of Myrtle Creek on what is known as Red Mountain, came into the city today and brought samples of gold quartz in with him which he exhibited to friends, and invariably the rock has been pronounced as appearing to be good. The specimens shown were taken from the surface and the ledge is a clearly defined one about 15 feet in width, with a dip into the hill in a north and easterly direction. Samples have been sent to Corvallis for assay. Color is easily obtained from the quartz by simple processes known to miners, and it is believed that Mr. Cole has stumbled upon a paying find.
