PARTY ISSUES

In France Are Practically Lost Sight of.

PRESIDENCY SAVED TO POINCARE

Tragedy in the Editorial Rooms of Figaro Retires to Private Life Men of Prominence in Public Life.

PARIS, April 24.—A single bullet fired by a beautiful woman has probably saved Raymond Poincare the presidency of France. Next Sunday, the date of the general elections, will tell the tale. On Sunday the fiercest political campaign the Third Republic has seen, comes to an end. Party issues have long since faded into a dim and distant background and the face of one who was once the lovely second lady of the land has taken their place. For the gory political fight though ostensibly staged for and against three-year-army-service, and income tax and election reform, has completely changed its complexion and in reality centers about a woman in prison. Six weeks ago the eventual resignation of President Poincare was being freely discussed. His political enemies, headed by the mighty Minister of Finance and Ex-Prime Minister Joseph Caillaux, were in power, holding practically every portfolio in the cabinet. Furthermore these same enemies stood a brilliant chance of continuing in power as the result of the elections next Sunday, whereupon, it was reported, President Poincare, his hands completely tied, would tender his resignation. Political wisecracks declared this eventually to be the consummation his opponents sought for.

Then, without warning, came the tragedy in the offices of the Figaro. Editor Gaston Calmette had been waging a merciless war of a semi-personal sort against Caillaux. One letter of an intimate nature, written, it was said, by Caillaux to his first wife had been reproduced in facsimile in the Figaro and report had it that others more compromising were to follow. Madame Caillaux, the cabinet officers wife, fearing letters to her, from Caillaux, were on the point of being published and that her husband would kill Calmette, herself called upon and shot the editor in his office. "France and the Republic have need of you," were the words she wrote in a note left at their home, just before the shooting, for her husband at the time, was fighting for an income tax in the senate. Feeling herself to be the unwilling cause of most of her husband's troubles, if anyone went to prison she said she wanted it to be herself. So she killed Calmette—she justified she only meant to wound him, and with the same small bullet killed her husband politically, taking him from "France and the Republic which needs him" much more effectively than all his political opponents together could have done in a lifetime. Calmette lived even longer than the statesman. The editor lived until after midnight of the day he was shot; Caillaux retired from the cabinet to private life three hours earlier, announcing he would not be candidate for the elections which come day after tomorrow. Further than that Madame Caillaux bullet killed her husband's party along with her husband's future. The Sunday elections, it is admitted, will retire Caillaux' political friends to private life, and it is conceded that the new party formed by Prime Minister Aristide Briand and ex-Premier Louis Barthou—President Poincare's political weapon—will win in a walk. This will mean a completely new cabinet, a cabinet friendly to the president, thus shutting off the possibility of his resignation. Some 600 members of the Chamber of Deputies are up for reelection.
