"STRATHMORE" OUIDA'S MASTERPIECE

Bertie Errol, a young English peer, marries Lucille, daughter of an exiled Russian noble and fearing his wealthy uncle's wrath, keeps the alliance secret, and arranges to have his wife live in one of the farm-houses on the estate of his friend, the great Lord Cecil Strathmore, who boasts himself woman-proof. Shortly after, Lord Strathmore meets an old enemy of his, Lord Vavasour, in Paris, whose wife so fascinates Strathmore, that he invites them to visit him in England. When they come there Vavasour is called away, and Lady Vavasour so completely captivates Strathmore, that he will not leave her, even to attend an urgent call to the house of lords. Bertie Errol has also been struck her beauty and in a moment of wildness presses his lips to hers. Then he regrets, for he knows too well the kind of a woman she is. Noticing how strongly his friend Strathmore is being ensnared, Errol reveals to him her true character, and that she is not Vavasour's wife at all. Quarrels ensue, and in a duel Strathmore kills his friend Errol, who has left a letter asking him to care for his wife and baby girl. The shock has killed the mother, and Strathmore adopts the orphaned girl as his ward. Lady Vavasour sinks from bad to worse, and returns now for vengeance, which opportunity is afforded her, when she learns that refused the rich French count, but has persuaded her admired guardian himself to marry her, and she can now taunt her with having married her own father's murderer. But when she sees the beautiful girl nestling so happily in the great lord's arms, she realizes that she was the cause of all the trouble and repents, and so leaves them in blissful peace. This greatest of Ouida's novels, with a wonderful cast, with the realiste duel scene, and charming minuet, and numerous thrilling situations, will be presented for one day only at the Palace theatre, Thursday.
