HEAT TREATMENT IMPORTANT IN AUTOMOBILE MAKING

A prominent scientist, in a paper dealing with steel used in the manufacture of motor cars, made the following statement recently.

"The heat-treatment of steel in a way is the most important operation to which it is subjected. There can be no unimportant details. It is essential that the work be done by skilful men, supplied with accurate pyrometers and well designed and constructed furnaces capable of maintaining a uniform heat and of being properly regulated."

What seems to have expressed precisely the opinion of Dodge Brothers. Not only do they insist upon expertness in every branch of the heat-treating department, but they see that scientific research work precedes the actual heating, so that there may be no error in determining in advance the exact degree of heat to which a bar of steel should be subjected to give it the proper wearing qualities.

Every different kind of steel, for every different part of the car, must be put through the research test to determine what degree of heat is best adapted to its quality and to its function in service. To determine that degree, hundreds of samples of steel are heated at different temperatures in small electric furnaces. The results of tests on these specimens, as made by various types of special instruments, are used in determining the exact treatment to be used in regular production. For instance, one of the first tests which a piece of steel undergoes after emerging from the electric furnace, is the Brinnell test for hardness.

Electric furnaces are used because electricity, more so than other fuels, may be regulated to a final point of exactness. The heat is confined within a drum or shell, heavily insulated. The pyrometer attachment will record as high as 1800 degrees Fahrenheit. After it is heated, the steel is cooled, either fast or slow, in one of the numerous different solutions standing nearby.

Every step of the long and careful process is a step in the direction of the exceptional durability that has given the Dodge Brothers motor car its high standing among motor car buyers.

HOW TO PRONOUNCE BROCCOLI.

Editor News:
In your issue of the 19th you quote me as claiming that the correct pronunciation of broccoli is as though it were spelled broc-co-le. This is an error upon your part. I merely stated that the word was an Italian one and, like other words of that language, used the short "i". Webster is undoubtedly the best authority for your readers but if I were asked to give as an example a word giving the "i" the same sound as should be given the one in broccoli, I should select another Italian word in every day use—macaroni. Now in order to judge how the present pronunciation of broccoli in this locality, would appeal to one accustomed to its correct use, just try the long "i" on macaroni. That's what we have been doing to broccoll.

Since the future of Douglas county is likely to be identified with a large production of broccoli and the word is to be one in every day use, it appears to me that the matter of correctly pronouncing the word is entitled to some attention from those in charge of our educational institutions.
