SMITH RIVER.

E. J. Harris and sons are busy this week at the mill sawing out a bill of lumber recently ordered for school district No. 67.

Marion Gunter returned home Thursday after a week or two spent in Portland and other points visiting friends and relatives.

Fred Clarke came up one day last week after the road scraper with which to do some excavating for the new room being built in the rear of the school house in district No. 67. The room is to be used, we believe, for a school kitchen and other purposes.

Ray Harris has recently bought a Eastman Kodak and developing tank, and is busy learning the mysteries of the fascinating photographer's art.

Arthur Woolley has been busy this week making some improvements on his house and doing some other carpentry work about the place.

Will Traylor came over to his homestead on Smith river one day this week after his horses with which to haul up a supply of firewood during a few days' idleness, due to the shutting down of the Leona mills where he has been employed.

Heavy thunder was heard the first of the week which was thought to be a forerunner of a snow storm, but to date (Jan. 19) there has been no snow this winter, and only a thin bit of ice some time the first of December. Earlier prediction of a severe winter missed the mark—much to everyone's satisfaction.

Grass is growing fine, fall sown grain is doing well, although a little late in starting, owing to the dry fall, which delayed its sprouting. Leaf buds are swelling. Pussy willows have been in bloom for some time. Many fear premature swelling of the fruit buds may result in damage to them later when the frosts and freezes come. X X

WM. HART'S FIRST ARTCRAFT PRODUCTION

An unusual interest is attached to the first photodrama featuring William S. Hart as an Ince-Artcraft star, which will be seen at the Antlers theatre on next Monday and Tuesday, for this story, "The Narrow Trail," was written by the famous interpreter of the Wild West himself, who built it around a series of narratives told him by a friend of the early pioneer days.

Hart recently made a whirlwind transcontinental trip. He had visited and received ovations in sixty towns and had passed through more than half the states before heading toward the coast and his beloved ranch. As the limited way rushing through the Dakotas, many things passed through Hart's mind, for it was in the Dakotas, then Dakota territory, that the first fifteen years of his life were passed.

The train made few stops, but halted for several minutes near Standing Rock—in the heart of the Bill Hart country and close to the first settlement his father had lived in. When the train moved on it carried from the wayside station an extra passenger, a tall, rangy, weather-beaten old gentleman who looked as though he might have been the earliest and last of the pioneers. He came rambling through the cars, peering into the faces of the passengers and plaintively inquiring if "young" Bill Hart was aboard.

The aged man was Richard Wainwright, who knew Hart's father well, and had given Bill his first lesson in horsemanship. Wainwright was a dashing cowpuncher in those days and was the boy's ideal and model. It was from this meeting, with its stories of the early days, that "The Narrow Trail" was evolved. Hart, on his return to the coast, spent his hard-earned vacation in jotting down these narratives and weaving into them a wealth of dramatic fiction.

There is in the picture much that is of historical value as a record of the time, which, although recent, has become almost a dream of the past. And there is much of the real William S. Hart in it.
