EACH SOLDIER HIS OWN LAWYER

Last summer a young resident of New Jersey, within draft age and sure, so he believed, to be called—he had claimed no exemption—sold all his possessions, closed up his business, and turned everything available into cash. When he got through he had over $4,500. He put $3,000 of this in a savings bank account and the balance in a checking account. Inside of a few months he was on his way to France. Just before he sailed, he drew and signed a multitude of checks on both banks, all to the order of his wife, each for $100 and each successive check dated one month later than its predecessor. He figured that $100 a month would keep his wife and child very comfortably, and allow a margin. He didn't want to hand her the $4,500 for fear someone would get it away from her or she would use it for some unwise venture. And he felt that inside of forty-five months surely he would get back. The first check for $100 was dated the day he left—the last check forty-five months after that. He boasted to his friends how clever he was. This is what happened: The first check and the second went through all right; by the third month the bank got wind of the fact that he had gone to France. They declined to pay any further checks.

Now why? Because, in the first place, a bank will not honor a check after the death of the drawer. Second, the bank could not know, at any moment that they cashed one of these checks, that the man was then alive. The wife found herself with a long string of checks on her hands, all perfectly good as against the man's estate, perhaps—which estate would come to her anyway—but which practically were of no use because the bank wouldn't honor them. Moral, do not try to scheme things out for yourself. Your bank account is the easiest of all your possessions to deal with. For this reason—in every case your bank, if you tell them what you want, will have you and your wife sign the proper forms which they carry in stock for almost any emergency. Beware of mere powers of attorney. Death revokes them.

Plans are now under way, according to announcement made by the National Tuberculosis Association for five great conferences covering the country in geographical sections from Atlantic to Pacific, to consider practical measures for coping with tuberculosis as a war problem. Starting in the northwestern states, this series of gatherings will extend next to the southwestern group, and then work eastward, taking in the south, the middle Atlantic section and ending with New England. Means of providing adequate care for the thousands of soldiers and sailors already discharged from the army and navy on account of tuberculosis and the still greater number rejected in the draft for the same reason will be one of the main questions discussed. The closely related question of educating the civilian population more fully regarding tuberculosis during the war and thus combating its further spread in the community at large, will also be considered. Not less than 1,000,000 persons in the United States, the National Tuberculosis Association states, are today afflicted with this disease, the annual death toll from which is upward of 150,000.
