Homeward Bound Exodus of Foreign-Born Americans

NOW that the Sixty-sixth congress is in session and is getting ready to argue the question of suspending immigration for four years, the administration has discovered that emigration of foreign-born citizens and residents of America to their native lands has set in and is about to materialize on a larger scale.

This unexpected development will have an important bearing upon the consideration of the immigration question, if it appears that workingmen are leaving the country permanently in large numbers.

The bill barring immigrants for four years in the last congress was advocated by the American Federation of Labor, and also by persons holding that post-bellum exclusion of immigrants would stem the tide of anarchy setting toward America.

Aside from those emigrating because of lack of employment there appears to be two well-defined classes of foreign population about to return to Europe.

One class is composed of those who are going back to succor relatives in the war-devastated regions and who intend to return to America, in most instances bringing their kin with them before the threatened passage of an immigration suspension law.

The other class comprises natives of the liberated countries of Europe, such as Czecho-Slovaks and Jugo-Slavs, who migrated to America to escape tyranny and now intend to return in the belief that they can live peaceably and happily under the conditions of the new regime.
