THE ROAD PROBLEM

SHOULD UNCLE SAM ASSIST IN HIGH WAY BUILDING?

Some Views of Prominent Men For and Against the Improvement of Roads in the Rural Districts by Government Aid.

In view of the large proportions recently assumed by the movement for federal aid in road building a number of prominent men in different sections have been asked to briefly state their views on the question. From these statements it will be seen that it is decided by the prevailing opinion it is time for Uncle Sam to take a hand in the warfare against mud.

President William H. Moore of the National Good Roads association, speaking from the standpoint of a moderate advocate of federal aid, says:

Unless the people in the different states take hold of the road improvement question vigorously and raise local funds with which to start the work they cannot expect the federal government to come and dump a lot of money into their coffers. But if the people show a disposition to help themselves and to secure proper state legislation I believe the federal government will come to their aid.

Senator Lattimer of South Carolina, who is a good deal of an enthusiast on this question, says:

I will tell you why we have not had any government aid in building roads during the last seventy-five years. It is because we have sent to congress men who live in cities. They get bills passed in the interest of cities. They have the harbors and rivers improved. What we want now is to have the principle of national aid recognized. We want the government to appropriate a fixed part of the money necessary to improve the roads in rural districts. We have a surplus in the United States treasury, and yet the farmers in the rural districts cannot get good roads. The men who have money in the cities do not object to being taxed for road improvement. It is the high-bred farmer living out in the country that has been protesting. If the farmers of the country will organize and elect to congress men pledged to carry out their wishes they will get a national appropriation to help them improve their roads.

Governor Cummins of "Iowa Idea" fame also has some ideas on the road question. He is very much in favor of better roads, but is rather inclined to "fight shy" of the national aid proposition, as will be seen in the following statement:

I believe that good roads are necessary and that they are necessary now, and I shall be very sorry to see this great movement and all the apostles and workers in this cause halt while we ask aid of the national government. The outcome of the proposition is problematical and its propriety doubtful. Whatever national aid may come in the future—and it may come, and I do not oppose proper and reasonable aid—for one, I believe that each state ought to take up and carry forward this question for itself without regard to national aid.

Judge J. B. Killebrew of Tennessee is strongly in favor of having Uncle Sam help the people to build roads in the country districts. He says:

Aside from the benefit which the construction gives for the construction of roads in the country for the establishment of post offices and post roads the "general welfare" clause ought to be sufficient if there were no other constitutional provision. This is no other one thing that can be done by the government that will add more to the general welfare of the people of this country than to assist in the building of roads. It is one thing that everybody wants. I shall never be able to understand why the congress of the United States should appropriate a million dollars for the construction and improvement of the highways of Porto Rico and devote a large sum to the same purpose in the Philippines and yet hesitate to make liberal appropriations for the building and improvement of public roads for the convenience of the masses. The United States is regarded by the people of other nations as the most powerful agent in ameliorating the condition of the people of the world. In all that is progressive except civil war it stands first. I do not wish the government to build roads throughout the United States, but to assist the local governments in that work. I should like to see the entire revenue tax on tobacco devoted to aid in the building of good highways in this country. This tax now amounts to over $20,000,000.

Hon. William J. Bryan has been studying the road question, and while he is somewhat of a skeptic about committing himself, his expressions indicate that he is inclined to favor the movement for federal aid. He says:

The expenditure of money for the permanent improvement of the common roads can be defended (1) as a matter of justice to the people who live in the country, (2) as a matter of advantage to the people who do not live in the country and (3) on the ground that the welfare of the nation demands that the comforts of country life shall, as far as possible, keep pace with the comforts of city life. It is a fact easily ascertained that the people in the country, while paying their full share of county, state and federal taxes, receive, as a rule, only the general benefits of government, while the people in the cities have, in addition to the protection afforded by the government, the advantage arising from the expenditure of public money in their midst. The farmer not only pays his share of the taxes, but more than his share, yet very little of what he pays goes back to the farmer. People in the city pay not only less than their share, as a rule, but get back practically all of the benefits that come from the expenditure of the people's money.

Just to what extent action should be taken by the federal government, the state government, the county and the precinct or in what proportion the burden should be borne is a question for discussion, but that country roads should be constructed with a view to permanent and continuous use is scarcely open to dispute. The people may be dependent upon to build not only a remedy, but the right remedy. The people now realize that bad roads are indefensible and are prepared to consider the remedy.

Use of Oil on Roads.

Professor Edmund O'Neil of the State University of California is of the opinion that, as compared with the advantages which are obtained from sprinkling roadbeds with oil, the objection to the use of oil in destroying the rubber tires of bicycles and carriages is comparatively slight. The oil acts as a solvent on the rubber, and while the inconvenience is great, when the great saving in cost over sprinkling with water is considered this phase becomes comparatively unimportant.

The democratic central committee elected B. W. Strong as chairman and he will appoint a secretary soon.
