

It is not half as important to a farm boy to know about bank discount or the height of an Asian mountain as to know what constitutes a good soil. Why compel him to get his mental training in study of many things he can use to little advantage and leave him in ignorance of trees and grasses and grains and animals? We do this because we have not awakened to the new industrial education. We follow rutts made by men who know few useful things. Courses of study should be made by men who know the application of science to everyday life. A new order of things is on the way. We shall bury the old. It would be done quickly if teachers were prepared for it.—W. J. Spillman.
