ARLEN R. R. EXTENSION TO BE 140 MILES LONG

Vale First Point Reached West of Ontario, Where Panic Stopped Work Once.

RIVERSIDE, Or., Aug. 20.—Practically every newspaper reader in Oregon knows that the Harriman people are extending their present line, a branch of the Short line, from its present western terminus at Vale, Malheur county, to the west. Just how far this extension will be constructed and how much work has been done, few know.

When work was begun on the extension westward from Ontario several years ago, there was an expectation that the road would be built clear across the state, or at least to a connection with the Southern Pacific. And this might have been done, but there came a time when the financing of important deals, even with companies as strong as the Harriman roads, became almost impossible on any reasonable terms. Hence the extension was only built to Vale, about 20 miles west of Ontario. That has been the western terminus since.

This road is now being extended about 140 miles, or, as the engineers say, to mile post 140, as all new work of the kind is blocked out into miles for the convenience of letting the contracts and general construction work. Hence the full extension from the Snake River, at Ontario, will be practically 140 miles.

The 140 mile post westward from Vale makes the designated terminus south of Dog Mountain, about two miles north of Harney Lake. In the great Harney valley, about 25 miles south and three miles west of Burns. There is a townsite being platted at the terminus, named Arden, after the great Harriman estate in Orange county, New York. The place was first designated as Lovett, but it was found there was another station on the system of that name.

Further Extension Expected.

Of course, it is generally understood that this will not remain the terminus long, perhaps no longer than at any other point west of Vale, for it is thought the road will be pushed westward to Odell, and then southerly to a connection with the Natron branch, which connects with the Coos Bay road, now building from Eugene. But there is no such provision in the contracts let. The general contractors are the Utah Construction company of Salt Lake, and they say their contract extends to Arden and no further.

Leaving Arden along the right of way to the east, over what was formerly called the Corvallis & Eastern, a road surveyed about 30 years ago, with survey in not down on most of the maps as the Oregon Eastern, the line runs about 20 miles east and nine miles north to Saddle Mountain, and passes around that mountain to the north, and thence four miles east to the little town of Harriman. At the present time this is the last real town to the west on the projected line, and it has only about half a dozen buildings.

Thus far the line has run along to the north of Harney and Malheur lakes. Harriman is almost due north of the extreme eastern end of the latter lake. Arden is about six miles east of the western end of Harney lake.

Arden Climbs of 2000 Feet.

The difference in the altitude between Arden and Vale is practically 2000 feet, or 2100 at Vale and 400 at Arden. As the distance is 140 miles, it will be seen that the average grade is about 14.28 feet to the mile. There are no mountains to cross; the entire distance is across valleys, like Harney, or along water courses.

Leaving Harriman for the east over the survey, the line leads almost due east through a fine valley, nearly level. In about seven miles you come to Crane Creek flowing down from the north. This is in the celebrated Crane Creek gap, which has figured in all east-and-west roads through the interior of the state for the last 40 years, or ever since there was any such talk, as that is the logical route to get into the great Harney valley.

Just why there has been such a fallacy about this and other gaps and canyons as strategic points, or points holding the key to the railway situation for the interior, the good Lord only knows, for there is room enough to build a dozen roads through the Crane Creek gap. And to the others we will come later.

At Riverside the advance guard of the railway builders is encountered, as an engineer's camp is just being established there, the picture showing from about to reach the camping site a few rods above the store and postoffice.

No actual construction has as yet reached Riverside, but blasting may be heard down the river.

GOVERNOR WEST ABOUT TO UNDERTAKE HARDEST JOB HE EVER FACED

SALEM, Or., Aug. 20.—Routing vice from its haunts in Redmond and Huntington has been but preliminary to the real fight Governor West is preparing in his law enforcement campaign. He is now ready to tackle the biggest job in the state. The next town on his list is the city of Portland.

Last night the city council of Redmond telegraphed the governor that the resignations of Mayor Jones and City Marshal McClay had been accepted and new officials would be appointed. Justice of the Peace Woods at Huntington also resigned immediately, so the slate is cleaned for new action.

When asked today where he would strike next, the governor said:

"I'm going to clean up Portland next."

He said he did not refer merely to roadhouses, but to the city itself. He said he did not care to discuss his plans, except to say he was prepared to shake the metropolis to its foundations unless the laws were enforced there.

The town of Sampter is giving heed to Governor West's warnings that the citizens must obey the laws, as indicated by a telegram received today from Mayor L. C. Edwards, saying the saloons observed the Sunday closing law yesterday. Several days ago the governor notified the district attorney and sheriff of Baker county that he expected them to see that the laws were enforced.
