LOVE and MARRIED LIFE by the noted author Idah McGlone Gibson

EYES THAT SEE NOT.

"I wonder," said Alice, anxiously, "if this economical independence that the new woman takes so much interest in is going to bring her greater happiness?"

"I am not sure," I answered, "that freedom means happiness. One may become accustomed to a ease for one's soul or body, I suppose, and find a kind of happiness that which makes the world outside look far more."

"Standing of the world outside," said Alice, "what has become of Karl Schmidt? He is not to be seen going out of town and they have written me that he is keeping him for his wife. Now, John told me that he had gone at last. Do you know anything about it?"

I left my cheeks turn. Although I did not know where Karl Schmidt was, I did feel a good deal about him and I wished again that I had not torn up his letter. I managed by my rather quiet, "I had a letter from Karl this morning, but he did not say where he was and gave me no address."

An Ideal Lover. "Good old Karl," said Alice, "that's exactly what he would do if he were like this. Let you know that I would like to see you and make it impossible for you to write him either pleasantly or unpleasantly by withholding his address. A man like that is certainly an ideal lover."

"A man like that," I repeated, "is certainly very clever. Had he given me his address I probably would have sent back his letter with a very caustic comment. As it was, I impulsively tore it into little bits and now find it indelibly engraved on my fingers."

"Poor John," said Alice. "Why poor John?"

"Because he doesn't understand, because he will never learn to understand. I am afraid. He does nothing that is love-like."

"Oh, you do," I interposed. "When he takes me in his arms he calls me 'girl,' and all the Karl Schmidts in the world would stay at the other end of the world for all I care."

"Just then I heard my husband's footsteps to the door. It was John, John Horn and Mrs. D. S. Beale, Riddle ladies who spent yesterday in this city shopping, left for their homes on the evening train."
