LOVE and MARRIED LIFE
 by the noted author
Idah McGlone Gibson

SELFISHNESS

Isn't it queer that we human beings more or less are dogs in the manger. I never had the slightest feeling of romantic love for my cousin Charles Goodwin, but it had been pleasant to my vanity all the years since I wore my hair in pig-tails for him to show me by word, action and devotion that he had never loved any other girl but me and had stayed single for my sake.

That is a selfish quality, isn't it? But we are all more or less selfish and it rather hurt me to find that on this, the last night in my mothers old home, which held so many childish memories for Charles and me, that he could desert me for Ruth. I told myself that it was the best thing that could happen for him and it was certainly the best thing that could happen to Ruth. They were more suited to each other than Ruth had been suited to Bobby, but nevertheless, that little hurt in my heart still ached.

To make a Success of It. If I were writing this for publication I would never tell all these intimate and somewhat sorry thoughts of mine, but instead, I am trying to put down all my inmost feelings so that I may read them over and find where I have faltered; find where I can improve. For whatever else shall come to me I am determined to make a success of marriage before I die.

Of course, I know it takes two to do this, but I do not despair with this knowledge.

And so determining not to think about Charles's defection, I went to my room and went to sleep.

I believe that my ability to sleep under any circumstances, if sleep is what I want, is the greatest of my possessions. I have never put me in such a condition that, when night came and I called upon the beneficent Goddess of Silence and Repose, sleep has not come to me, and with solace fingers pressed my eyelids softly down upon consciousness, from which I have always awakened refreshed and fortified, ready to meet all that might come to me in the next waking hours.

All through the morning I made myself think only of the preparations for getting away. Charles came early and helped me with his usual thoughtfulness and efficiency. Ruth, with little Ruth in her train who since her Fritche had taken a dove like devotion to Charles, whom she treated on calling "Uncle Sam's care" because her mother had impressed upon her that Charles had saved her from death. They all stayed for luncheon and I began to see more clearly what a delightful thing it would be if Charles would marry Ruth.
