ALICE AND TOM CALL.

"Well, why have we brought all of this furniture over here if we are not going to use it Katherine," John asked.

"I am going to use it upstairs," I said as John followed me upstairs. "I think I shall enjoy the dramatic contrast of the Oriental splendor of our living rooms with the Colonial austerity of these upper chambers. And, Oh, John, they are wonderful! They are wonderful! I repeated. We stepped from one room to another. "These two bed rooms, with a dressing-room and bath between will be ours. This one shall be the guest chamber, and this darling little suite of three shall be given up to Mary and her nurse. Oh, I think it is wonderful. Look! Here are sleeping porches for Mary and you. And here in this alcove I can have my coffee every morning. John, the house is ideal.

"It will be when it is paid for," was his only comment.

"Why, of course, we can pay for it, dear, if you will promise me that you will not invest any more money for a while in stock margins. We can easily pay for the house with the profits of your next big advertising contract."

"I am not sure, dear that I can do that. Business is rather slow. You know that is the reason, Katherine, that I started in on the curb market; its the little market."

"You mustn't want to make money too fast, John."

"Can any man make money too fast," he answered.

"Yes, dear, much too fast. We may envy the suddenly rich person, but did you ever know one whom you would like to make your friend?"

"But I wouldn't be one of those newly rich guys who could think and talk of nothing but money."

"Yes you would, dear. We always think and talk about the thing we are most interested in. That makes us think we are impressing others with our importance. The man who made his millions in the war never for a moment thinks that he made his money by his own genius and his own capabilities. Do you ever hear one admit that it naturally flowed into his pocket because of the great necessities of the war?"

"Hello, everybody, hello!.. The voice came from below and John and I both turned and looked down over the balustrade of the balcony and saw Alice and Tom.

It was the first I had seen of Tom since I returned. Dear old Tom, I know of no man that would be easier to live with than Alice's husband. True, he isn't very easy on the eyes, being fat, bald, and somewhat bandy legged, but his smile is the kind that won't come off. His hand clasp is warm, and his eyes are kindly. I think down in her heart Alice loves him dearly, but she tells herself that she is not; that they are only friends and pals because he doesn't fill up her aesthetic eye."

"Come up here Tom," I shouted, "and see the rest of our lovely home."

"I am looking at something quite as lovely," he answered.

"Tom," said Alice with a smile, "You are too gallant."

"I have told the truth. Isn't Katherine pretty as she looks down at us. Juliet in her balcony could not have outdone her."

"Tom, if you were not so ugly you would be the most popular man in the world," joked John.

"Perhaps it is because you would like to say that it is because I am so very ugly that I have to resort to flattery for popularity. I would have you understand, John Gordon, that I do not believe in falsehood and never had any friendship and respect for Annanias, either ancient or modern."

Tom came up the stairs at this with his hand clenched in mock defiance. I caught it and put it up to my mouth for a kiss.

"It is a strange thing to me," mused John audibly, "that an ugly man is apt to get the osculatory favors that should come to a handsome man like me."

"Well, you would not have me refuse a lady would you?" asked Tom with a smile.

"Do you mean to tell me, Katherine that you asked him to kiss you," asked John as though very jealous, keeping up the fun.

"Well, I didn't ask him in so many words."

"Does a woman ever ask in so many words? Can you say that you did not ask me Katherine?"

"No," I answered honestly. "I wanted to kiss you Tom."

Makes Desperate Theft Attempt

CORVALLIS, July 23—R. W. Kern, express messenger on the Southern Pacific, is in jail here today awaiting the action of the grand jury on a charge of grand larceny. Kern is accused of taking $1,055.62 from the local express company and it is reported that he has confessed.

The money was transmitted by L. L. Graham, the Southern Pacific agent, to Portland. All the banks being closed on July 5, when Mr. Graham sent the money, he sent the money in currency by express. It was received for by express messenger Conley on the train that goes through here from Newport at 4:25. For some reason, Conley neglected to transfer the money at Albany to the main line but carried it through with him to the end of his trip. He brought it back again the next day and again neglected to transfer it at Albany. At Corvallis, however, he turned it over to express clerk, Raymond Anderson.

When Kern's train came along bound for Portland, another clerk in the local office, Albert Presley, took the money package with two other packages into the express car and said, "Here's a sign up Bill," which is the customary method of handling such transactions.

Presley then turned around to superintend some other loading for the fraction of a minute, but that fraction was long enough for Kern to dispose of the money package and say to Presley: "Where's your third package, here."

He had signed for two. Presley insisted that he had brought it in and Kern showed him that it was not there. The train pulled out and Presley reported the matter.

Detectives of the American R. R. Express company were immediately put on the trail and with local officers succeeded in discovering something on Kern that convinced them that he was the fellow they were after. They found that he had been under suspicion in other troubles and that he had been arrested for bootlegging over in Idaho and a number of other things that they thought justified them in accusing Kern. When they did so and he saw that they had him in a tight place he gave up and confessed, saying that when Presley turned around in the express car that day, he had thrown the package behind the toilet.

All of the money was recovered with the exception of a few checks which Kern had destroyed.

PRISONER FROM REEDSPORT.

Sheriff George Quine returned last night from Reedsport bringing with him Milton Anthony, who is charged with stealing and burning a motor boat belonging to Jos. Lyons, the Reedsport postmaster. Anthony was given a hearing before James K. Cavers, justice of the peace at Reedsport, and was bound over to the grand jury under $1000 bonds. The boat was stolen July 3, and upon search was found eight miles up the Umpqua river under water. Upon raising it, it was found that the boat was chopped and damaged by fire beyond repair. Deputy Sheriff Fred Schulte, a resident of Reedsport, made an investigation, with the re-ult that a warrant was issued for Anthony's arrest. It is reported that Lyons and Anthony have had previous trouble. Last year the former accused the present prisoner of adulterating cascara bark purchased by Mr. Lyons. This and other trouble, it is thought, is responsible for the theft and wrecking of the boat. Anthony plead not guilty in the justice court.
