LAND PRODUCTS SHOW TO BE FINE

Executive Committee Already Working on Plans For the Big Event.

LIVESTOCK FEATURED

Farm Crops, Horticulture, Poultry and Many Educational Features Included in List for the October Shows.

The executive committee of the Farm Bureau plan to make the Land Products Show, which is to be held at Roseburg in October, one of the most interesting and educational enterprises held in the county during the entire year.

All the farmers, stockraisers and orchardists are given a splendid opportunity to show what can be done in Douglas County.

Livestock Will be Feature. One of the most important divisions of the Land Products Show will be the livestock division, which will be under the direct supervision of Mr. G. O. Barrett, of Glendale.

There have been a large number of registered cattle and sheep brought into the county within the last two years, and the improvement which has resulted should be well demonstrated. This is an opportune time for all livestock raisers to decide upon the number and kind they can place on exhibit and handle their stock so as to make the very best showing possible.

Farm Crops to be Included. The committee, Mr. J. B. Large, of Oakland, who has this division of the Land Products Show in charge has been busy for some time collecting and arranging exhibits of the different kinds of grains and grasses.

Several farmers have also reported that they were preparing their exhibits, and it is expected that there will be a showing in this department which will be a great credit to the grain raisers of the county.

Horticulture to Hold Important Place. With Mr. E. C. Armstrong, the County Horticulturist, as superintendent of this department, it is expected to prove one of the most interesting features of the whole show.

Growers of all classes of fruit will be given an opportunity to place their products on display. As Douglas County is one of the leading horticultural counties in the state, it is expected an extensive exhibit will be made in both commercial and educational lines.

Poultrymen to Exhibit. Commercial poultry flocks are becoming an important item in the industries of the county. While these flocks consist principally of the White Leghorn type, the raisers of all other standard breeds are given a chance to display their birds.

This division of the show is under the supervision of Mr. G. W. Burt, who is arranging to have several educational exhibits put on which will prove of interest to all those who are engaged in poultry raising, or who are interested in the proper care of the farm flocks.

Show Not for Grown-ups Entirely. Mr. A. E. Street, the County Club Leader, has worked out a premium list to cover the various departments covered by the boys' and girls' clubs and is doing some enthusiastic work among the boys and girls who are enrolled in this work.

This work has always proven an interesting feature, and it is planned to make it of educational value to the greatest extent possible.

Educational Features. Lectures on all important divisions of agriculture will be given by persons versed in their special departments. There will also be demonstrations given by several of the clubs in the county, which will undoubtedly prove very interesting to all who attend the show.

The premium lists are being prepared and all who are interested in making exhibits in any of the departments are asked to file their names with the County Agent's office, in order that a copy may be mailed out as soon as they are ready for distribution.

Conductors Able To Work at Rest

BURNOS AIRES—The street car conductors of Buenos Aires are now able to sit down while not collecting fares. The "city fathers" have passed an ordinance some time ago requiring the street car companies to install hinged seats attached to the platform structure of all cars for the exclusive use of the conductor. This equipment has made its appearance and the "guardas", as they are called in Spanish, are enjoying the novelty of sitting down while rush-hour passengers on the platforms stand up.

LOVE and MARRIED LIFE by the noted author Idah McGlone Gibson

OUR SORROWS ARE OUR OWN.

"There is no reason for calling Mr. Gordon, now, Mrs. Gordon," said Miss Parker. "I think the baby will be all right." "But I want Mr. Gordon here," I said. At that moment I understood, perhaps more than ever before, what marriage, any kind of a marriage, meant to a woman.

"John was my husband, a part of me, something that was mine to lean upon." All his affairs and mine were bound together. We could no more get away from each other without hurt than could either one of us top off a hand or foot. John had to listen to me. My unhappiness came to me from the outside, and now, more than at any other time, when our baby was concerned, I felt that I must have him near me.

I was selfish enough to want him to share my sorrow, not realizing that we lonely human beings can share sorrows with no one. Joys can be shared, but in the grief, the human heart is always solitary. Of course, I knew that John would be very sympathetic about Mary, because he loved and took a great deal of pride in his child, but I do not think that down in his heart, he had ever gotten over the disappointment he had at her not being a boy.

Although he told me that he was very glad she was just what she was—a second edition of me. I took a sudden resolution and went to the phone. "Give me Main 7827," I waited impatiently.

"Line is busy, Madam." "To whom could John be talking?" I asked myself. For I knew that by this time all the people should be away from the office. In fact, I told myself that I had hardly expected to find him there. I paced up and down the room for a few minutes, while I said to myself: "John Gordon is talking to Elizabeth Moreland, while his baby is probably dying."

"Of course it was foolish. I had no right to come to such a conclusion, but it was human, nevertheless." Again I took the receiver of the "hook." "Still busy?" A rasping cough came from the other room and I hastened in. "She's all right," said Miss Parker, answering my agonized look of interrogation. "You must expect she'll cough a little."

I hurried back again to the phone. Please give me Main 7827, Central. "A woman's voice that I recognized as John's secretary said, "Yes, his is Main 7827—what is it?"

"Is Mr. Gordon there, Miss Stoner? It is Mrs. Gordon speaking and it is quite important."

"Mr. Gordon has been gone from the office most of the afternoon," Mrs. Gordon. He went away quite early, saying he was going over to the new house. Everyone has gone from the office except myself. Can I do anything for you? Shall I telephone to the club or anywhere else?"

"No, thank you, Miss Stoner, I will call up the different places where he might possibly be. I was with him myself at the house this afternoon and when I left I had an idea that he was going back to the office, although he said he had a dinner engagement. The baby is quite ill and I wanted to get him if possible."

"Oh, I hope it is nothing serious. Are you sure there is nothing I can do to help?" "No, thank you. The doctor was called immediately and Miss Parker, my nurse, is doing everything possible, but you understand that I am really quite anxious to get Mr. Gordon. He would be much concerned and would want to be here."

"I hope you will find him and I shall telephone early in the morning to find out how the baby is." I was quite sure that my intuition had been correct. John had taken Elizabeth somewhere to dinner. Hastily I called up the country club, the athletic club and a road house some few miles from town which was frequented by most of our set. Then I called up John's mother's house to see if Elizabeth was still there.

"Madam Gordon has gone over to her daughter's house for dinner," said Henriette, "and Miss Moreland left some time ago with Mr. Gordon. I thought he was taking her to dine with you, Mrs. Gordon."

From the feeling in Henriette's voice, I gathered that she thought something quite different. MONDAY—Katherine Banishes the Gloom.
