HER DAUGHTER AND HIS SON.

BY IDAH McGLONE GIBSON

A Spirited Conversation.

"Thank you very much, Mrs. Cameron," said Kenneth, and even under these sad circumstances he could not resist winking at me, "but unless you have something very important in mind, I think I shall stay with father and Ann."

"Surely a boy of your age would have nothing to offer which would be of any great help to your father or Ann."

"Oh, I don't know, Mrs. Cameron," he said with another lowering of the eyelid, "I might offer myself."

"Dear, dear irresponsible Kenneth! He would joke if he were dying and smile at you if he found you in the same condition."

His levity had a good effect on me, however, for I could not resist a smile as I turned to Kenneth and said tritely:

"This is rather sudden."

Mrs. Cameron looked at me in horror, for she was one of those literal creatures who would believe we were at least partially in earnest. And I also had a feeling that she would go away and tell that I was laughing and joking with Kenneth at a time like this.

I wonder why it is that we impose such horrible conditions upon those who are supposed to be grieving. Surely we want everyone to be happy but by strictly conventional etiquette one must never have the appearance of thinking of one's own selfish grief. This conventionality is on a par with the old-fashioned idea of draping one's self in sombre mourning, and always emphasizing the fact of uncontrollable and everlasting grief.

It makes one a hypocrite, because one cannot shut out all idea of worldly affairs, even though one is crushed by the loss of one's nearest and dearest. Somehow mourning has always seemed to me an ostentatious display of a very sacred emotion that should be kept from mortal eyes.

At this moment Mr. Halsey arose quite ceremoniously and said:

"Well, good afternoon, Mrs. Cameron," and walked toward the door. She had to follow and did so with an good grace as possible, saying:

"Then you're not coming, Kenneth? I have a letter from Grace I would like to show you. In it she says that you had promised to take her to the next sorority ball, which, if I am not mistaken, is tomorrow evening. Are you leaving tonight for college?"

"I have already wired Grace that it will be impossible for me to be with her and have also wired my chum, asking him to take her. I cannot leave Ann until I know that she has at least settled upon what she is going to do."

Mrs. Cameron could not resist one more thrust, and turning to Mr. Halsey she said:

"Strange, isn't it, that our children think that we can do nothing without, the advice of their inexperience?"

Mr. Halsey just bowed and held the door open a little wider. As Mrs. Cameron passed through, he closed it softly and with a sigh of relief said:

"Strange how that woman always rubs me the wrong way. She always did this as a girl, when she, your father and mother and I, Ann, belonged to the same set."

"Someone told me she was angling for you dad," slyly said Kenneth.

"Hush, lad, that is one of the things which a gentleman never discusses."

"I wonder if you know dad's creed, Ann?"

"It is that you can do anything you want to in this world, if you are perfectly still about it, but if you should be found out, then you will be punished. He has an idea one is punished, not for one's sin, but for one's carelessness in being found out."

"I shall have to send you after Mrs. Cameron," said Kenneth's father, impatiently, "if you insist upon dragging in irrelevant, as well as nonsensical, ideas. Can you never be serious, Ken?"
