HER DAUGHTER AND HIS SON.

BY IDAH MCGLONE GIBSON

Mr. Halsey Talks
"You do not mean, Mr. Halsey, that Ken attempted suicide?"
"No, Ann, unless you would call what he has been doing for the past two months suicide."
"How could it have happened then?"
"As nearly as I can find out, Ken was out with his same old, wild crowd last night. He managed to get some liquor from the house, which he used surreptitiously in the glasses at the restaurant. You haven't seen Kenneth for some time. If you had, you would have learned that even now a little liquor has changed him entirely. Sometimes, and I say this regretfully, I think that is why Mrs. Cameron not only allowed her daughter to accompany him on these disputable parties but encouraged them. I feel that Mrs. Cameron was sure that sometime she would be able to make Ken do exactly as she has done."
"But surely, Mr. Halsey, Mrs. Cameron did not want Kenneth to die."
"No, of course she didn't."
"Then, what do you mean?"
"Just then the telephone rang and as I answered it, I heard Jimmy Callahan's voice."
"Is that you, Ann?"
"Yes, Jimmie."
"Is Mr. Halsey there?"
"Yes! Tell me how Ken is."
"Then you know?"
"I know very little. I only know that Ken is in the hospital suffering from the effects of poison."
"May I speak to Mr. Halsey?"
"Is he worse Jim?"
"Not any worse, but they say his recovery is doubtful."
"Jimmie, you don't think he tried to commit suicide, do you?"
"Never in a thousand years, my dear girl. Looks more like wood alcohol."
"Has Ken been conscious at all?"
"That's what I want to talk to his father about. He seems to be coming out of his stupor, and the doctors want his father here."
"Are you at the hospital, Jim?"
"Yes, Mr. Halsey sent for me and I told him I would wait here while he went over and broke the news to you and got you to go and see Grace Cameron."
"But he hasn't said anything to me about Grace Cameron. He seems so broken up over Ken that he is unable to tell me much about him either. I don't understand, Jimmie, why should I talk to Grace?"
"Well, someone must go to her and find out where they all were last night. Grace was with him when they brought him to the hospital, at midnight, but she made such a fuss that they sent for her mother to come after her and take her on home. Since then that idiot mother of hers has been calling up the hospital every five minutes saying that her daughter is at death's door, and asking how Ken is. Of course, we're not sure whether or not she got some of the stuff. I really hope she has, but personally I think she is too clever to drink much when she is out with Ken. Will you tell Mr. Halsey for me that he better try to get here as soon as possible. And, on the way over, if he has any influence with the newspapers, he had better get in touch with them personally, and have them call of their reporters. The waiting room here is just full of them. Go along, dear girl, then hurry to the Cameron's at once and telephone me what you learn tomorrow—Feeling the Worst."

MANDOLIN IN SECOND PLACE

Italians in New York Now Exhibit a Decided Preference for the Phonograph.

Many an odd note creeps into the American process of the melting pot; often there is a queer mixture of the modern with the old-established national customs. Probably nowhere in Brooklyn is there a better illustration of this than in the big Italian colony lying in the region between Brownsville and east New York.

There nightly you hear the Italian's love for music loudly expressed, not through the tinkling mandolin or guitar of Naples, but through the ultra-modern phonograph. The moon beams down brightly, and perhaps damselfs as fair as those of sunny Italy peep through shuttered windows, but the serenade below is one by proxy. Carnoso and McCormack, Martinelli and Slezak, Galli-Curel and Farrar vie with each other in vocal flights through horns of brass and fiber.

Naturally the beloved mandolin, often brought with the bundle of clothes from far-off Sicily or the Neapolitan hinterland, is cherished still, but the native tunes and airs are confined largely to the barber shops or the sadly-altered wine cellars.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Had a Record.
The only way it would move was down stream with the current. The owner had worked on it all afternoon. In the evening another boat came up. "Having a bit of trouble?" came the question from the new arrival.
"Yes," replied the owner and went on working with the engine.
"So you own this boat? What did you have to give for her?" asked the new arrival.
"Thirty-five dollars," replied the owner.
"That's not a bad price, but that boat has been around Ravenswood a number of years and I've known it to sell for $25," said the new arrival. "But yesterday it made a new record; it was sold for $15."—Indianapolis News.

MYSTERY OF GREAT LAKES

Scientists Unable to Explain the Rise and Fall of the Water Along the Border.

Why does the water in the great lakes that lie between a large portion of the United States and Canada rise and fall in periods which average seven years? This natural phenomenon has been a puzzle since the days when France held sway in Canada 200 years ago.

In an unpublished diary of an English traveler who voyaged up the St. Lawrence river to Niagara, Ontario, in the summer of 1783, is the following reference to this mystery of the waters: "A remarkable circumstance was told me by Mr. Pansee, our conductor, who had been constantly engaged in this navigation for nearly twenty years, and which he advised me is a matter of fact both from his own observation and that of the oldest inhabitant. Each year the St. Lawrence river settles or falls a little until the seventh year, when it is visible that it has sunk between three and four feet, and then for the next seven years it continues to rise in the same proportion. The river is at this time at its greatest elevation (July 1, 1785). I took pains to gain some information of this uncommon phenomenon. I find that the lakes have the same appearance."

Careful government records were begun about the year 1820 and since then it has been found that the periods between high and low water are sometimes as low as four years and some times as high as nine years, although they average seven years. This year the water is again at its lowest in the lakes and river, and freight carriers are having trouble in various harbors.—Christian Science Monitor.

WHALE BIT OFF TOO MUCH

Attempt to Make a Meal of Pacific Cable Proved End of Sportive Creature.

The direct descendant of the whale that swallowed Jonah flapped his huge tail through the tranquil waters of the Pacific, off Mexico. He was hungry—hungry for a new sensation. All the thrills in that neck of the ocean were on land, where the Mexicans were conquering Mexico. Idly he shot a column of water through his nose into the air. What with the submarines out of the sea, life had lost all zest for a whale. The submarine idea flashed through his brain and tickled his ambergris. What a jolly lark, to be sure! He would dive below and scare the saucer and octopus into a fit. Down he went.

Now, the All-American Cable company, which took over the Mexican Telegraph company, has some valuable rubber-wound copper wires lying on the bottom of the ocean off Mexican headlands. They met the gaze of his hero.

He seized the long thing in his mouth. It stuck. History has never recorded any whale who ever attempted to eat a Pacific cable and got away with it. Our hero was no exception. He struggled, and finally wound himself up in several thousand dollars' worth of interrupted messages. When the cable repair ships have to and grappled for the cable to find out what had interrupted communication between Vera Cruz and Valparaiso, Chile, they dragged to the surface a very dead whale, wound up in several hundred feet of hopelessly complicated cable.

Chief Engineer James Mowat, who went ashore, and lives in New York, says this is the first whale he ever heard of that tried to eat a cable. And other members of the crew of his ship vouch for the story.

If you want to see the much advertised Ro-San Sanitary closet, send postal to H. G. Wilson, Box 1295, Roseburg.
