HER DAUGHTER AND HIS SON.

BY IDAH McGLONE GIBSON

A Battle of Wits.

Grace had just acknowledged an acquaintanceship with Clement Johnson, the manager of the cafe where I had worked, when her nurse returned. Before Grace had an opportunity to stop her, the nurse, not knowing me or my mission, and apparently fearing a reprimand from Grace, blurted out:

"I know I have been gone longer than you expected, Mrs. Halsey, and I'm sorry. But I hurried every minute. I got the promise of the society editors of all the papers to print your notice prominently and they all seemed eager to get the pictures I gave them of you and your husband."

"Grace!" I exclaimed in horror, "what did you send to the newspapers? Do you know I've spent hours trying to keep this out of the papers and pritect you and Ken?"

"I thought you and Mr. Halsey would do that," replied Grace, "and I was determined to have my notices. I want everyone to know that I am married to Kenneth Halsey. Kenneth's father needn't feel badly about it. My position is quite as assured as his."

"What did you say in your notices?" I pleaded. "Did you say that Ken is in a hospital?"

"Of course I didn't, booby. You don't suppose I want the public to know that my husband was made ill by drinking on his wedding night, do you? I merely stated Ken and I had stolen a march on our many friends (of whom, my dear, I hope you are one) and married very quietly last evening. And I believe I added that we should probably go south for the winter."

I drew a sigh of relief as I said: "Then my mission here is finished. I shall take your explanation of the license back to Mr. Halsey."

"You can also take the marriage certificate, if you want to, Ann. No, I guess I'd better hang on to that. By the way, what are you going to do? Oh, you needn't look so innocent. I've known all my life that you hoped to marry Ken some day yourself. Oh, I know you, Ann. In spite of the pretense of your independent ways, you are quite as anxious to be supported and taken care of as I am. The difference between us is that I am honest about it; I don't lie to myself. I know what I want and go after it. You may call me selfish if you wish, Ann, but mother and I have stared poverty in the face too long. We have been living up our principle for the last two years, and for mother's sake I felt it my duty to make a brilliant marriage financially. You, of course, can do as you please, Ann, for you have neither father or mother."

Was there a slight intonation of irony put upon the word "father," or was it my sensitiveness? I didn't know, and yet I answered:

"No, I have no one who spells 'duty' to me, but even in your position, Grace, I could not subscribe to your philosophy or live your life."

"Oh, you're lying to yourself again," she said in the most heartless tones she had used yet. The gentle Grace Cameron of childhood was gone. The refinement and character which had been hers by inheritance had yielded to the training of a calculating mother. The old exterior of gentle ways Grace still had. But in any situation which ruffled her, Grace Cameron flashed a nature as hard and cold and selfish as the most worldly of women. Grace Cameron's mother was now reaping what she had sowed. "You, like all other women," continued Grace, "accept the inevitable. You didn't get Kenneth and I did, so you're making a virtue of your defeat. I despise that kind of virtue myself."

For a moment I was too furious to reply. When I had composed myself, I said:

"I am not defeated, Grace. The time will come when Kenneth will find you out, and realize that he never really cared for you, but that his senses were infatuated. God pity you the day this realization comes to him."

"Will it come with your help, Ann?" Grace Cameron uttered this question languidly, tantalizingly—affecting an unconcern she little felt. Though her lips smiled with pretended self-confidence, her eyes smouldered with hate, anger and fear. Did Grace Cameron intuitively see the inevitable end? I could only wonder. Then I spoke:

"I shall do nothing to open Kenneth's eyes, but it will not be for your sake that I remain silent, but for his."

BEAVERS DO MUCH MISCHIEF

Property Owners in the Adirondacks Are Uneasy Over the Situation They Have Created.

Because the limited intelligence of the beaver goes no further than its own immediate purposes, owners of property in the Adirondacks are wishing that the beaver was less industrious and seriously wondering what is to be done to stop the increasing number of these willing workers from decreasing the value and beauty of this famous region. The forest rangers of the conservation commission, says a writer in the Albany Journal, last summer estimated the undesirable results that had followed the building of nearly 600 beaver dams, and found that an area of about 8,681 acres had been flooded, and something like $51,000 worth of good merchantable standing timber was being destroyed. Considering that the number of beavers, now estimated at about 18,000 is believed to be increasing about 3,000 a year, the damage bids fair to become a serious problem. Not only do they destroy valuable timber, but they are steadily changing the character of the Adirondack scenery along the water courses and altering the shore line of the lakes; yet the region without any beavers at all would not be the Adirondacks as nature made it and as those who now go there to enjoy its beauty like to find it. Time was when the beavers seemed likely to vanish, and the state took them under its protection; now the danger seems to be that they are so well protected that they will eventually "come back" in numbers out of proportion to the normal population of beavers when the Adirondacks were subject to the conditions of life in a wild country.

NUMBERS IN EAST AND WEST

Difference of Opinion as to Whether Odd or Even Figures Are Lucky or Unlucky.

We are pleased to term thirteen an unlucky number, observes London Answers, but in Japan the unlucky number is four, and in Burmah even numbers are all considered less lucky than odd ones.

Our lucky numbers, or what are generally considered so by superstitious folk, are three and seven. If you ask the reason you are told that God is Three in One, and that God made holy the seventh day.

As for seven, this number is supposed to be lucky either by itself or in its multiples. As an old writer says, a boy sheds his teeth at 7 years old; at 14 he becomes a youth; at 21 a man; while he reaches his grand climacteric at nine times 7—that is 63.

The figure three is extraordinarily prominent in the Bible. Noah had three sons, and Job three friends. There were three patriarchs. Daniel's three companions were thrown into the fiery furnace, and he himself was three days in the lions' den.

Had Lots of Pluck.

George Thibault, proprietor of the summer hotel at Outlet, a village a few miles from Picton, Ont., was driving his car towards home recently when he chanced to meet a herd of cattle. The owner of the auto slowed down to allow the animals to pass without undue excitement. All went well till he met the leader of this large bovine family, a splendid young roan bull. The latter resented the presence of the mechanical contrivance bearing down through the herd on low gear. Lowering his massive head, he charged, resulting in only a few bruises to himself, but a twisted axle, a badly bent fender and a smashed headlight to the unfortunate motor. As Mr. Thibault inspected the damage he remarked emphatically: "I certainly admired his pluck, but he showed poor judgment."

Ice Cut With a Gas-Driven Saw.

For the purpose of cutting ice expeditiously during the last winter, there was devised a saw of an automobile type power plant and a circular saw at the end of an adjustable arm, so that the saw can be raised and lowered to the desired degree. The saw is pushed along on steel runners, the operator behind furnishing the motive power. A double lever arrangement just over the handle bars serves to control the raising and lowering of the saw. The portable saw in question cuts the ice into 20-foot squares. These squares are guided through the water to a gang of four circular saws, which cut the squares into the regulation sized cakes.

The Airplane In Politics.

Mr. Holman, the former New South Wales premier, rejoices in the huge electorate known euphoniously as Cootamundra. On the eve of a very warmly contested election, Mr. Holman recognized that Cootamundra had 18 large centers, each of which required a personal canvass in order to insure the return of its present able representative. He announced, therefore, that he would use an airplane to cover the electorate. Not to be outdone, his labor opponent at once made plans to drop propaganda by airplane over Mr. Holman's route.

Heat-Insulating Material.

A new heat-insulating material composed of a mixture of a special clay and cork has been discovered by a Norwegian engineer. The clay and cork mixture is burned and the result is the formation of a very light substance that is said to be eminently suitable for all heat-insulating purposes.
