HER DAUGHTER AND HIS SON.

BY IDAH MCGLONE GIBSON

Ken's New House.

I slipped into the routine of the work as Mr. Halsey's secretary so easily that it seemed to me after I had been there a week or two that the office had always been my home. Mr. Halsey turned over all his personal affairs to me, and I tried to get the min good shape before I should have to assume the other duties that Jimmie would bring with him as manager.

Among other things, Mr. Halsey showed me a safety deposit box in which he had kept every letter that Ken had written him, and told me to be very sure to preserve all of his boy's letters and notes.

It was a streak of sentiment that, even knowing Mr. Halsey as well as I did, I hardly expected to find in him. He would often go to the box and take out some of Ken's notes, and read them over and over again. He had admonished me to open all his letters, whether they were marked personal or not, and I asked him specifically if I should do this with Ken's letters, and he said: "Yes, I want you to know exactly what Ken writes me, because I shall often ask your advice about him."

I could not help seeing from Ken's letters that he was not particularly happy; although he was evidently trying to keep it from his father. The letters were full of descriptions of gay times that they were having at Hot Springs, for they were coming north by degrees, having spent Easter at Bermuda, returning by way of Hot Springs.

"Grace is quite determined," wrote Kenneth, "that she will not arrive until the decorators have finished with our house." I noticed that Ken never called the place home. "She dreads the confusion, she says, and she wants to walk into it as though she were walking into fairyland."

And truly their new house was a castle in fairyland. They had bought the Harkinson place months before, and put it in the hands of an architect and interior decorator, with instructions to make it perfect in design and finish.

"Grace wants to know nothing about it," said Kenneth in one of his letters. "She said she had perfect faith in the decorators, and that she wants every room to be a surprise to her." Mr. Halsey groaned as he read this sentence, and I heard him mutter to himself: "That woman will ruin Ken before he comes to his senses."

It seemed to me from the later letters that Ken was coming to his senses, for he wrote that he was getting very tired of the continual round of social affairs that made up their lives.

"I want to see you, dad," he said. "I cannot understand why you would not come to us down here at the springs. It would do you good and I think you might persuade Grace to go back at once. I shall be mighty glad when we get into our house, and it certainly ought to be something fine if the bills I have been paying have anything to do with it. I wish you would ask Ann to go over and look through the place and write to me about it. Some way, I am not just satisfied to leave it all to the decorators."

As Mr. Halsey read this, he said: "Let's go over tonight and see the house, Ann."

"I don't want to, Mr. Halsey," I said, "and besides, I do not think Grace would approve of any suggestions that I might give to Ken. If I don't see it she can find no fault with me."

"I guess you dislike her as much as I do," said Mr. Halsey quickly. My face flushed, and before I thought, I said: "I think she is the most hateful, selfish woman I have ever known." And then I added more calmly: "But, poor thing, I sometimes think her mother is more to blame for her faults than she is herself. Grace Cameron is her mother's daughter."

RUNAWAY BOYS HELD.

Noah Bechtel, aged 17 years, son of a real estate dealer of Jennings Lodge, and Harold Heathman, 17 years of age, a resident of Portland, were picked up at the local depot this morning. The boys were on their way to San Francisco, having left home "for a trip." Bechtel carried a .32 Colts automatic revolver which he claims to have bought from a dealer at Oregon City. The parents of the two lads were notified by wire that they are being held here, but at a late hour this afternoon no answer had been received by Chief of Police Shambrook.
