HER DAUGHTER HIS SON. BY IDAH M-GLONE GIBSON

MR. HALSEY REMINISCES.

The letter from my father dropped from my hands as I finished reading

It.

So this was the father I had never seen—the father who did not know
I was living; the father who, unknowingly had broken my mother's heart and who had in consequence
sentenced himself to years of exile

in a savage land.

I looked up to Mr. Halsey who was standing beside me and through the mist that obscured my own eyes I noticed that his were filled with tears.

You will love your father, Ann,

"You will love your latter, he said.
"Whether he will love me is a more important question."
"Of course he will love you, child.
He will probably want to adopt you

ite will probably want to adopt you legally."

If elt a little cold chill run down my backbone.

"So I was not legal?"

What a queer thing it all was. Here were two people who had loved each other devotedly, and who had in all faith gone through the marriage ceremony, only to find that through the fiesalish plan of another they were not, in the eyes of mannade love, married, and that they had no right to happiness for themselves or to recognition from others. I looked back over the years that my mother had been separated from the man she loved—the man to whom she had in all honesty given herself—the man for whom she lived a life of loneliness and disgrace in silence, while he had gone to the other end of the world and there he had worked out an explation for his unwitting sin.

"I wonder if they were right in their Spartan adherance to principle," I asked mushngly.

"It was your mother, Ann, who was the Spartan, answered Mr. Halsey. "Bot fold me the night he world away that he had beseeched your mother to go away with him.

"I became almost insane," he said, at the thought of leaving Margaret. It seemed to me that we could hide ourselves away from the

"Bob, 'said Margaret, 'I would always know. I sometimes think that morality as well as happiness is a state of mind. Some people think that a great love might excuse a great sin, but I always feel that because of great love I must keep myself without stain."

"When your father told me that. Ann, he was nearly beside himself.

"Think what I have brought on Margaret,' he said, 'the woman for whom I would willingly give my life. I dare not speak of the other who, not content with taking all my faith in womanhood, now, when a sweet, pure soul restores it to me, simply thrusts me out of what has been a heaven on earth into the utermost depths of hell."

"What happened—or rather how did it happen that my father did not know that his former wife was alive, Mr. Halsey. Mother told me something about it and was going to tell all. There seemed to be so many more important things for me to know just at the last."

all. There seemed to be so many more important things for me to know just at the last."

"Well, you see, my dear, as you probably know your father became desperately infatuated with an acress, much older than himself, while he was a boy at college, and in a wild moment he married her. She was a fiend incarnate and shortly after the marriage she became insane. Then, of course, he could not divorce her and for a number of years he was nearly insane himself. He drank and let all his old friends drop away from him. I clung to him and when he would let me, I made him meet some of my triends.

"Your mother, my dear, had al-ways been one of our old childhood companions and I know now that she had always loved Bob. But at-
