HER DAUGHTER AND HIS SON.
BY IDA H. GIBSON

At the Wedding.

Jerry did not even come back for Mamie and Jim's wedding and no one heard a word about him. Mamie asked me to be her bridesmaid and I consented before I knew that Jim had asked Ken to be his best man.

I shall never forget my sensations as I walked up the aisle alone and was met at the altar by Ken. For one second I met his eye and felt myself suddenly grow pale and then I knew that it was my own vanity which made me think that I saw longing and almost despair in the face of Kenneth Halcyon.

I had a feeling, for a single instant, that I had been caught and strained to his breast with a conclusive virility which made my breath come short. I felt the hot blood surge over my face. I did not dare look again until the ceremony was nearly half over and then I stole a look at him. His eyes were fixed on some object straight before him. His face was as immovable as a mask and had been carved in stone. His lips were compressed. He hardly seemed to breathe.

Up until this time I had thought that Kenneth was unhappy but I had never dreamed of the abyss of despair into which he had thrown himself. He reminded me of a modern Prometheus bound to the rock of matrimony while the vulture of dead love gnawed at his heart. He did not know that anyone was studying him, and such is the habit of social observation that as the minister pronounced the words making Jim and Mamie husband and wife, he turned with a smile and greeted them.

Gone from his face was every vestige of sorrow and despair. On his lips was a smile of congratulation and real friendship as he took Jim's hand in his clasp.

"I sincerely congratulate you, old man," he said, "for I have grown to care very much for your wife since I have known her. She will certainly make you happy if you give her half a chance."

"You can count on me for that, Ken," said Jim with a happy smile. "What am I doing when I am marrying her but giving her a chance to make me happy?"

"I thought that you were promising to make her happy, Jim," I said softly as we formed ourselves in the procession and walked down the aisle to the strains of "Believe me if all these endearing charms."

"I hate public weddings," said Ken in my ear. "Don't you Ann?"

"I don't know. This is the first one I ever attended. Up to date it has not developed anything which would inspire me with hatred, although I do not think that I would care for a public wedding myself."

"Do you know, Ann, I always thought that you would marry Jim," again whispered Ken.

"Surely you have lived long enough to know that I seldom marry the people our relatives or friends pick out for us, Ken."

Did Ken Halcyon whisper under his breath: "Would to God I had," I asked myself as I turned to him and questioned, "Did you speak?"

"No, Ann," was his short answer and again I decided that my anxiety had been in vain.

"Do you know how Mamie and Jim have arranged their married life?" I asked Ken as we got into the motor.

"No," he answered. "Have they arranged anything out of the ordinary?" In Mamie going to give up her career and settle down to the delightful task of spending all that Jim can earn? That always seems to be the next step after the wedding bells," he concluded bitterly.

"Nothing of the sort. Mamie is going to keep on with her work. She and her mother are going to live in an apartment at the Hearstley which Jim furnished up for her rather extravagantly, as a wedding present. He has taken an apartment across the hall for himself. It is furnished in typical man fashion and he will have a Jap to care for it while Mamie's mother will rejoice for the first time in her life in being able to direct a couple of serving maids."

"Great Heavens," said Ken. "When did they get that idea?"

"Well, it seems Jim has always had it in the back of his head and he told Mamie that since he had seen the unhappiness of most of his friends he had decided that he would try something new."

"What will they do if there are children?"

"I don't know whether they got so far in their plans but probably if there are children Jim and Mamie will provide an apartment for them."

I concluded with a laugh.

"Well, they are in for some newspaper notoriety if the plan for their marriage gets out." Then Ken turned to me and said: "What have you decided to do with yourself, Ann? Surely you can not work in father's office since your own father has returned."

Tomorrow—Kenneth's Request.

Wilder and Agee to Build Annex

As soon as weather conditions will permit, Wilder and Agee will commence the construction of a fire-proof addition to their store building on Jackson street. The addition will be built in the rear of their present store building and will include a space 25 x 20 feet to the present floor space. The structure will be one full story high with a large basement which will be equipped for the storage of goods. The firm expects to add to its already large line of boys' ready to wear garments and will carry a full line of boys' apparel. It is also possible that the business will branch out along altogether new lines. The present quarters are very crowded and an enlargement has been made necessary by the rapidly growing business.

Girls Team Will Play Saturday

One of the best basketball games of the year will be played tonight at the high school gymnasium at eight o'clock between the Roseburg high school girls team and the Grants Pass high school team. The local girls have been practicing diligently for the past few weeks under the coaching of Miss Emma Deland of the Domestic science department and are in fine condition for the contest this evening. This is the first big game of the basketball season for the girls team and will be witnessed by a large number of local fans. The lineup of the Roseburg team will be as follows: Ruth Burnett, center; Doris Price, side center; Esther Moyer and Grace Wickham, forwards; and Lucille Durland and Camille Patterson guards. There has always been a great deal of rivalry between the Grants Pass girls and
