HER DAUGHTER AND HIS SON.

BY IDAH MCGLONE GIBSON

The Story of Ken.

They tell me that I was ill for weeks. I only know that I awakened to all the joyous notes of spring about my open window with my father, paler and thinner, sitting beside me.

"Ann, Ann! At last you know me," he said as with great effort I pulled my eyelids upward until I had a full view of his face.

"Why, of course I do. Why shouldn't I know you? But, but—Memory was playing me strange tricks. 'Have I had a terrible dream, Dad? Have you been ill? Was Kenneth here, or did I dream it all?'"

"No, my dear, it is all true, and the only thing, perhaps, that you do not realize."

"Yes, yes, I know. I fainted last night."

You fainted several weeks ago, my child. Look out doors. It is spring. The roses are beginning to bud. I have had time to make age's slow recovery. Time to follow you almost through the gates of death itself. Oh, Ann, I shall never cease to be thankful that you have come back to me.

Several weeks ago! I fainted several weeks ago? And then I almost shrieked. "Where is that telegram?"

"Hush, hush, my child. It is all right now. It is all right."

"But the telegram. Did Ken send it back to you? I remember that the nurse said that he had a message which took him home. What did he do, father? Where is he?"

"Hush, my child, hush," again said my father. "I am afraid that you will have a relapse. Trust your father, dear. It is all right. Everything is all right now. And just as soon as you are well enough you and I are going to Switzerland for the summer."

"What are you keeping from me, Dad? Tell me. There is something behind all this that you are afraid for me to know. Is Kenneth alive? Where is Grace? Oh, Dad, you must tell me; you can't keep it from me."

"Kenneth, my dear child, is immersing himself in his business, trying to forget."

"Trying to forget? Forget what? What has happened, Dad? Tell me quickly. Don't you see that I cannot wait?"

I tried to pull myself out of bed. To at least raise myself on the pillow, but I found that I was too weak. I sank back with a groan.

"Oh, my dear, you must not, you must not do it. Here, let me help you." And putting his arms about me, he lifted me up.

With a great effort, I raised my arms to his neck. "Dear Dad, you must tell me all about it, won't you?" I whispered.

"Of course I will, child. I have just been waiting for you to be well enough to tell it to you."

"Here is your medicine, Miss Carleton. I am afraid that you are getting too excited."

I hadn't noticed the nurse before. My father obediently put me down among the pillows. As he did so, I whispered, "Send her away, Dad, send her away for a little while."

He did not have to do so, for after giving me my medicine the nurse turned to my father and said, "If you will be staying here for a little while, Mr. Carleton, I will take my walk now. I would advise, if possible, that you, Miss Carleton, try to sleep. I will be back in about an hour."

"Has she gone, father?" I asked as I heard the door close softly.

"Yes, my dear, and now you will go to sleep, for if anything would happen they would blame it all on me, you know. I should hate to have them give you an opiate."

"You can give me an opiate, father, for after you have told me all that has happened since I have been ill I know that I can go to sleep."

My father took a sudden resolution. He seated himself very near my bed and, bending over, clasped both my hands in his.

"After Ken had read the telegram," he commenced.

"Did he read the telegram?" I asked, eagerly.

"Why, of course he read it, my dear child. When you fainted it slipped from your nerveless hand. I think there was murder in Ken's heart as he left that afternoon for home. He has never told me what happened when he arrived. I only know that two days afterward Grace ran away with young Simington, leaving a note for him saying that her threat held good and that if he attempted to divorce her she would come back and fight the case with a counter suit, naming you as co-respondent. We succeeded in keeping the affair out of the newspapers by giving out that Grace had gone to the south of France for her health."

"I expect there was more or less talk, but of course we did not hear it, especially as at that time we all despaired of your life. That was, as you know, my dear, several weeks ago."
