Alicia Hammersly A Woman Who Wouldn't Remarry

By Idah McGloose Gibson
The Noted Writer

Alicia's Doubts.

(Alicia Hammersly—nee Alicia Atwell and commonly called Alix—is telling the absorbing story of her girlhood. She is engaged to Hallet Hammersly. On the morning of her wedding day she wonders if she really knows the man she is to marry. Alicia's thoughts lead her to seek her mother for consolation. She finds her mother in the attic seated before an old trunk which is "filled with memories." As Alicia enters her mother is fondling a pair of baby shoes. Alicia's mother consoles her and points out the great happiness to be found in a marriage of understanding, but warns Alicia that it is something very different from the day dreams of an engaged girl.)

"Mother! Mother! Where are you, mother?" shouted Bart from the hallway below.

"Coming, son, coming! No, don't come up here, Bart," she added, and I knew that she did not want my brother to see my tear-stained face. "I am coming right down. I have been hunting out some thing that the women of our family, Bart, have always worn since your great-grandmother's day."

I heard Bart ask with a laugh,

"Have the women of my family always been as silly as that, mother? What difference does it make what a woman wears on her wedding day?"

"You will understand some day, my boy, that it makes a great difference," interrupted my mother, and then their voices became indistinct as they went down the hallway.

I seated myself in the place where my mother had been. "Am I really getting married without realizing the importance of the step I am making? Am I entering into something for which I am totally unprepared?" I asked myself.

I felt I must see Hal, see him immediately, before it was too late. I rushed down the stairway into my room.

"Central, give me Plaza 7482."

"Is that you, Hal dear? I must see you immediately."

"Yes, I know, that mother said that you must not come until the hour set for the wedding, but something very important has happened to change our whole lives. I must see you."

"Oh, I can't tell you now, over the phone, but you will come, won't you, right away?"

"I will go down to the hall door and watch for you. I will let you in myself and we will go into Dad's room. It is the only one that is not full of people or presents at this moment."

"Of course, I know that you do not understand, Hal, but you will, and then we must decide what to do."

I hung up the receiver and, although I knew that Hal could not arrive for at least ten minutes, I went down into the hallway.

"Alix, Alix, come in here a moment. I want you to see your latest gift," said Bab as I passed the library.

"I can't now, dear. I am very busy."

"Oh, you have time to see this exquisite rug that Dad's partner has sent you."

I went to the doorway. It was simply beautiful, and it came to me immediately that I would have to return it if Hal decided that neither of us knew enough of the business of matrimony to be married today.

"Isn't it lovely?" said Bab, plumping herself in the middle of it. "I think that I would marry almost any man for this."

Bab does not understand marriage either, was my thought. No girl knows about marriage. Why are we not told? It is wicked.

Just then the doorbell rang and, exclaiming that I thought it was Hal, I rushed to the door, opened it, and was taken in my lover's arms.

"Don't! Don't!" I gasped. "Come into Dad's room." And I pulled him along unceremoniously.

Hal stopped me quickly just inside the door. "Now tell me what it is. Someone will be coming in here in a moment."

I looked in surprise in his face and I caught the thin red line of his mouth that I had before seen only in imagination, and the decisive contour of his chin. I knew now how his voice sounded when it was quick, sharp and impatient. It was a new Hal who stood before me—a man I did not know, but as my eyes timidly raised themselves to his, his habitual tender smile came back and his arms went about me.

"Mother says that love is not all we should know when we marry, Hal. And she says we must be prepared for something very different from what we have known."

Hal frowned. "Your mother—" and then he stopped suddenly. "Tell me about it."

I told him of what had happened in the attic, and at its end he said, "You and I, dear, are not any different from the millions who have started out, as we are starting now, on the uncharted seas of marriage. Whether our love as we know it now will last, or whether it will change into something different, we cannot even guess. But whether it will last or not, we know only one thing and that is that you love me and I love you madly. For me that is enough."

"Think, dearest, what it will mean when we are together always. Why, darling, life would be impossible if we did not marry. I love you, I want you. I can't work; I cannot do anything when I am away from you but scheme how I can be with you again. Oh, Alix, it is not true, the things your mother has been telling you. We will love each other always and be just as we are now." He strained me to him and I was on the mountain top again.

Mother must be wrong; even mortals can live there always.

LEGION BUTTON IS JUST AS GOOD AS THE STEEL DERRY

Glennora Scala, a legionnaire of Newark, N. J., may owe his life to a Legion button.

Scala was leaving his home, when, on the sidewalk close at hand, he saw four men engaged in a heated argument. As he approached them, one of the quartette pulled out a revolver and fired. The bullet missed the man for whom it was intended, and struck Scala with staggering force.

Believing he had been shot, he glanced down, looking for the wound. He found none. Instead he found his American Legion button, which had been in his coat lapel ripped and dented. Before a policeman could come up the four men had bolted.
