Alicia Hammersly A Woman Who Wouldn't Remarry

By Idah McGlone Gibson
The Novel Writer

An Old Sweetheart of Hal's

"Life is good after all," I said to myself, as I began my brisk walk down the hill, "and nothing can spoil it, for me while the very air I am breathing is laden with that exquisite message of spring, of youth and of love,"—and at the foot of the hill I was to meet my lover.

After all, happiness comes easier to the young than sorrow. I had hardly gotten a square from the house before I had forgotten all about the days countless little annoyances which someone has described as the modern martyrdom, and I was going again to the purple rim of the world where Love was waiting to welcome me.

Abruptly I turned the corner and immediately asked one of the questions I had asked myself on my wedding day was answered. I knew that Hal looked at other women—at least at one other woman—just as he looked at me.

In the gathering twilight my own heart nearly stopped as I recognized my husband holding both hands of a tall slender woman. I was too far away to catch the expression of her face, which was partly turned from me, but Hal's whole attitude was the same tender, half-protecting, half-teasing one that he always assumed when he was particularly interested in me, when his eyes were caressing and his voice spoke of love.

They were so engrossed in each other that they did not realize that there was anyone else on earth.

"I am so glad to see you, Nell, dear," I heard Hal say. "I have been thinking of you almost hourly since I returned to this place where we used to see so much of each other."

"Do you expect me to believe that?" the woman asked, somewhat quizzically it seemed to me.

"Certainly I do. Just because a man is married is no reason why he should not think of some other woman who filled his hours with happiness long before he knew his wife. He cannot help thinking of his old love."

"Was it love, Hal?" she asked a bit wistfully.

I suddenly realized that I was just about to hear something that perhaps I should not, and I called out "Hal."

The woman turned suddenly and looked at me. It seemed to me that pity flashed up into her eyes and settled around her mouth for just an instant, to be replaced by interest.

If Hal was disconcerted he did not show it. "Goodness how you startled me, Alice. I didn't suppose that you were within a mile of this place."

"Did I hear the word 'evidently' whispered under the woman's breath I asked my self."

"Come here, dear, I want to introduce you to a very old and very dear friend of mine, Miss Marshall."

We bowed and murmured each others names. At least I murmured her name and she made some sort of an inarticulate sound. Then she put out her hand, I put mine into it. I liked her. She seemed to be human.

"I must run along now," she said. "I am coming to see you soon, Alice. I may call you Alice, may I not?"

Not waiting for a reply, she looked straight into Hal's eyes and said distinctly: "I know that you will be very glad to know, my friend, that I shall transfer all the affection I had for you to your wife."

"Oh, you can not give her all of it," remonstrated Hal, and it seemed to me that there was an undercurrent of pleading in his joking words.

"Every bit" was her reply, and with a nod of adieu, she left us.

"Who is she, Hal? Isn't she beautiful? I felt like a French doll beside the statue of Venus de Milo."

"Yes, she is very beautiful," answered Hal absent mindedly, and it seemed to me there was a little bit pique in his tone.

"How long have you known her, dear?"

"All my life."

"I don't see why you didn't fall in love with her."

"I did" was the unexpected reply, "she was my first sweetheart."

"But you told me that you had never been in love with any girl but me."

"No, dear, I didn't tell you that. I just let you believe it. I said, if you will remember, that I knew now that there was such a thing as love and you had made me realize it, that what I had felt for all other women before I knew you was but the shadow of a dream."

"You called them flirtations, Hal and I never dreamed that anyone loved the person he was flirting with."

"You are quite right, my dear," said Hal tucking my arm under his and letting his hand caress the bare wrist at the end of my sleeve.

And at his touch, the grey of the twilight was threaded with silver and I looked up to see the silver crescent of the new moon.

Tomorrow—When Hal Proposed.

Search In Vain For Boy's Parents

THE DALLES, April 1.—Somewhere in this land a mother's heart is aching—aching for a boy he does not come home. And somewhere a father's love is reaching out—and is searching for the son who will never be found.

The boy, Thomas Moore, is lying in a county grave in the Odd Fellow's cemetery here, the victim of a very strange accident.

Moore was fatally injured in a fall from a high cliff at Arlington in February. He was brought to The Dalles hospital but did not regain consciousness long enough to tell where he came from or where his parents were living.

The body has just been buried after a long search for the boy's parents. That they are living was evident from letters found in the young man's pockets.

Wasco county furnished a simple resting place for the lad who died alone and apart from his loved ones.

MEDFORD TEACHERS GET NO PAY INCREASE.

MEDFORD, March 31.—Without granting any increases in salaries, the Medford school board has re-elected practically the entire teaching force of the public schools, including Aubrey G. Smith, superintendent, and O. R. Campbell, principal of the high school. Thora Smith, teacher in the university high school in Eugene, was elected to the teachers' training position in the high school, to succeed Margaret Black, who did not seek re-election. Salaries were increased last year.

Harry Davis of Dillard was a business visitor to the city today spending several hours attending to various business matters.
