Hal's Habits Persist.

I tried very hard after Hal went away that morning to interest myself in putting our apartments in order and in the making of the little easy clothes for the baby—but I could not become interested.

For the first time, I was sorry a baby was coming to me.

I told myself I did not want it, and in the next breath I upbraided myself for even thinking of such a thing.

In later years I came to know that the woman who has no children is always an unhappy woman but that morning, I wanted to be free—free to show Hal that I could be just as thoughtless of him as he was of me. Of course, that was not a very high purpose or ambition, but it was a very human one.

During the morning the thought came to me that I could write a story—as I had often done in school days—upon some of the problems that came to a woman in my position, and then and there I sat down and wrote a story which I called "Marriage". The whole thing just unrolled itself. I wrote as rapidly as though I were writing a letter. I became so interested that I did not realize that I had eaten no luncheon and it was nearly dark before I saw how the time had flown and now I must prepare dinner.

I carefully put away my manuscript, because I did not intend that Hal should know anything about it. When he came home, I met him with a smile as though nothing had happened, because I had decided that it would not help matters to prolong a disagreeable tension.

"Now you're like your old sweet self," said Hal cheerfully. "I knew you would be all right, and I am not going to be neglectful again. You're looking fine, Alix, and you're the best little cook in the world. If I weren't so 'all in' we would go to a show this evening."

"Did you go to the funeral this afternoon, Hal?"

"No."

Again I understood that that was like my husband. He never would do a disagreeable thing if he could possibly avoid it—never give himself a bad quarter of an hour.

"I wrote Nell a little note," he said, "telling her I knew she wouldn't miss me among her many other friends today, but that you and I both would do all we could to help her in the future. Poor girl, I hardly know what she is going to do."

I was not long left in doubt, however, for a few days afterward, Nell Marshall came over to see me. She wanted to tell me that she was going away to take up a stage career.

I told her of this.

"Why surely you think she is fitted for something of that kind?" I said. "She is good looking and she sings a little and dances well."

"Perhaps. But I hate to think of anyone I care for going on the stage. Not long afterward I learned that Hal had managed to give her $500 with which to tide her over the first few months and she got settled in her new work.

The days went on in endless monotony for me. I did not have that ecstatic feeling of expectant motherhood that some women talk about. Perhaps it was because in some way I felt daily that Hal was losing interest in me that he had had before we were married. I grew very despondent as the time drew near. I knew very few people in the town in which we were living. Two or three times Hal had brought his men friends home to dinner; but the effort of preparing the meal and the knowledge that I would have to put out a greater effort to put the house in order, afterward made me so apathetic that I presume I appeared to be stupid before his friends; besides I had a feeling of self-consciousness which at last made me ask him not to bring any one else to the house.

More and more he told me that he was busy at the office. More and more he did not come home to dinner. More and more often he would stay out very late, although never did he remain until dawn. I knew that he was gambling, because there was many a time when he left me with very little money. Hal was never miserly or stingy with me. When he had money, I was welcome to all of it, but he often was thoughtless about giving me money unless I would ask him for it. I husbanded the check my father had given me carefully, but at last it seemed to me that I could stand it no longer, and I told Hal that I must go home—must go home for the birth of my child.

Tomorrow—A Mother's Advice.

Harding to Send Message to Church

(By Associated Press).
MARION, Ohio, April 22.—There's going to be a new Baptist church at Chalk Butte, Meade county, South Dakota. The corner stone is going to be laid soon, and when the stone is swung in place, the chink of the trowels will sound a message of good will from President Harding, old time friend of the pastor, and from the president's church here, Trinity Baptist.

The men's Bible class of the Marion church that President Harding attended, before he left for Washington, has taken up a collection to pay for the corner stone, assuring the church's pastor, Rev. John Wynn, that it wanted the honor.

Rev. Mr. Wynn used to preach in Marion in the days when Mr. Harding was a country editor. He was pastor of the Baptist church at Green Camp, Marion county and, at one time, pastor of the Emmanuel Baptist church here.

When the new church at Chalk Butte, became a reality, Rev. Mr. Wynn wrote the men's Bible class of Trinity church, asking if it did not want the honor of purchasing the cornerstone. A collection for that purpose was taken up in record time and the money is all ready to forward. The cornerstone is to cost $40.

HAVE A GATHERING PLACE.

Some humorist once wrote in a vein of sarcasm to the effect that human beings are not unlike sheep—"where the leader goes, so goes the crowd." For years it has been the custom of the farmer folks to gather in Roseburg on Saturday and a study of this fact brings forth many peculiar things. The country gentlemen and their families gathered here today in large numbers and as usual the men congregated on their favorite stamping ground, the west side of Jackson street, between Cass and Oak. Just why they gather in this one particular spot has never been solved, but it is a well known fact that should you wish to locate one of them on a Saturday afternoon here, that section of the city would probably be the first place you would hit for.
