Bab's Ideas of Marriage

I did not have time to think very much about what mother said to me for I was so glad to be back home among the friends of my girlhood that I could do nothing but talk of them. I never knew how dear my old girlhood friends were until I tried to make new ones in a strange place.

All my old friends, including Duane, came to see me, and he was quite as flattering as ever. I found that I liked compliments even when I knew they really meant nothing except an agreeable sound.

Bab was up in arms the moment Duane informed us that he had come purposely to call on me and that he expected to monopolize my attention until I should return.

No one knew that I was expecting a baby and naturally I did not tell them, but the next morning Bab said: "I just can't see what Alix wants with my property." Mother was present and was quite shocked when she said this.

"Hush, Child!" she commanded in a horror-stricken tone.

"Are you and Duane engaged?" I asked.

"Not yet, but soon," interrupted Bart, especially if Bab can make him ask her. I tell her that no man wants to be run after the way she's running after Duane, but she won't take my advice.

"You think you're very smart, don't you Bart, with your man-of-the-world air? How long since you have become a bachelor of age and discretion. Duane is very devoted to me Alicia, when you're not around. He has dropped all the other married women of his acquaintance and I am sure that he is now thinking of marriage eventually."

"If eventually, why not now?" said Bart.

"Oh, shut up, can't you?" exclaimed Bab.

"Well, I'm telling you, just the same," was Bart's parting shot as he started out of the room. "I wouldn't ask any girl to marry me if I ever thought she was leading me into it."

"She will never be looking for you to ask her, Bart, so you need not worry."

"Do you care very much for Duane, Bab?" I asked that night as she came into my room to brush her hair and have a cozy corner chat with me.

"Yes, I think I do," she answered. But it seemed to me that there was an element of doubt in her voice.

"He is the best catch in town. Alicia, and I believe I could be as happy as the average married woman if I should marry Duane. Any man who I did not actively dislike and who had money enough and inclination to give me all the things that Duane can, would satisfy me."

"Why, Bab, it seems to me that's a pretty sordid idea. I never thought little sister, that you would talk like that."

"I don't consider it sordid. It is just sensible. Mighty few girls understand that there is a great difference between love and marriage. Personally, I have a feeling that I wouldn't be very comfortable if I should become greatly in love with some man."

I have found that to be loved is much pleasanter than to love. Why, Alix, you were desperately in love with Hal before you were married. But, I don't believe you have been as happy as you expected to be. If you were, you wouldn't be asking these long visits home so often. And, I don't see any great anticipations in the postman's ring on your part, when you are here. But, I remember distinctly, how, before you were married, you could hardly write for the mail man when Hal was out of town for twenty-four hours."

"Well, there is a different feeling now Bab," I acknowledged. "After marriage, you are absolutely sure. There is something about the marriage tie which in many ways makes you understand that you and your husband are one. Whatever Hal may be thinking, however much he may neglect me, he can't get rid of me without a great deal of trouble."

"Would you want to keep him if you knew he did not want to stay?" asked Bab curiously.

"I do not know," I answered. "You see, I am still sure that Hal wants to stay."

I said this with a sigh, because I did not want to tell my little sister as I thought of her, that I had not had a word from Hal since I had come home, and I was beginning to be very much worried. Surely he would have written if he really did care.

Just then we heard the postman's ring. Bab looked at me expectantly. I did not move.
