Leaving Home.

I knew from my mother's face that Mr. Early had said nothing to her about my intended business departure, and I thought it best to keep her in ignorance until we were alone.

Mr. Early and I said very little to each other on our way to the country club. Instinctively we fell into that friendly silence which speaks so eloquently of similarity of taste, complementary temperament and adequate understanding which makes for camaraderie.

Mr. Early made a wonderful impression upon Duane Benton—his personality seemed as pleasing to men as to women—and I felt that the whole dining room at the country club was buzzing with gossip about my coming in to dine with a strange man. With this knowledge came also the realization that I knew nothing about Roland Early personally. Womanlike, I had told him all about myself while he had vouchsafed nothing in regard to himself and his affairs.

I did not talk much through the luncheon. My problem was too big for me to join in the gay badinage that flashed from Bab to Mr. Early, was picked up by Duane and then caught deftly again by the magazine editor.

"Why are you so still, Alix?" asked Bab. "I hope you are not going to be like most authors—perfectly stupid in society."

"Mrs. Hammersly could not be stupid. She is one of those women who does not have to speak to be eloquent."

Duane looked up quickly and seemed about to say something sarcastic, but evidently thought better of it. Mr. Early began to ask about trains and notwithstanding both Duane and Bab inviting him to stay over, he quietly refused and insisted upon being taken to the afternoon train.

I could see that Bab thought it strange that I did not accompany him, but I made little Hal the excuse for my returning home, and bade Mr. Early a somewhat strained goodbye.

"What was the matter with you at luncheon today? Had you and Mr. Early been quarreling. I never saw you so silent."

"No, my dear, we had not been quarreling. On the contrary Mr. Early has offered me a position on the staff of his magazine and I expect to take it."

"What! What can you do on a magazine?"

"He evidently thinks I can do something, for he has offered me a hundred dollars a week for a certain class of editorial stories and will pay me current prices for my fiction, extra."

Bab looked at me shrewdly. "Did Roland Early tell you anything about himself? Do you know whether he is married or not?"

"Well, he took precious good care to find out whether you were married."

"That is perfectly natural. He knew that if I had a husband I would not be able to accept the position he had to offer."

Bab seemed only half convinced and at dinner when I broached the subject to father and mother the storm descended.

Dad seemed to take it as a personal affront. "Why, Alix," he said, "haven't I been treating you well? One would think you were not happy in your father's house."

"Why, of course I am happy, Dad. But do you not understand that after a woman marries and has had a family of her own, she must make a nest for herself, even if she makes it alone?"

Mother fairly went at the thought of being bereft of little Hal and it was only when I told her that I would leave him with her until I was fairly settled in my new home, with everything properly arranged for his comfort and good health, that she became in the least reconciled.

At last it was settled, but for some foolish fancy that I could not explain. I did not notify Mr. Early that I was coming for three or four days.

I had intended to wait a week, but upon receiving a letter from him, curt and businesslike, asking me if I had made up my mind, I telegraphed, "Have accepted your proposition. Will be in your city on Monday."

ALICIA HAMMERSLY.

Mr. Early met me at the train and I found that rooms had been engaged for me at a good hotel, an arrangement on his part which I appreciated when I realized that but for his thoughtfulness I would probably have been without a place to lay my head, as there was a political convention in the city and every place was overcrowded.

After explaining what he had done for my comfort, he allowed me to go to the hotel alone, saying that he presumed I would want to be alone for a few hours to recover somewhat from my journey. He told me he would return about five o'clock to take me over to the office and introduce me to the staff.

"Of course I understand, Mrs. Hammersly," he said, "that you will want to settle yourself in an apartment as soon as possible."

"Yes," I said eagerly, "I must get some place where I can have Hal and his nurse."

"Then you intend bringing your babe here?"

"Of course. What made you think I would not?" I could not live, much less work, without my baby boy near me."

"Forgive me. I realize from your tone that I didn't know anything about it, Mrs. Hammersly. But as you had told me how devoted your mother was to your boy, it occurred to me that you might think he might have better care with her than with a nurse in the hours of your absence."

I turned my head for fear the thought which came into my mind would be reflected on my face. I wonder if I am going to dislike this man, was my thought.

Tomorrow—An Ugly Face.
