

Alicia Hammerly A Woman Who Wouldn't Remarry By Max McGee Gibson The Social Editor

A Startling Interview.

"Mrs. Roland Early."
Stupidly I looked at the card again and again.
What did she want of me—and at that late hour? I had visions of some accident, but in my very wild flights of imagination I did not dream what Mrs. Early was going to say to me.
However I hurriedly slipped into a dressing gown and presented myself before my visitor.
A rather tall woman, with deep blue eyes and hair that was beginning to turn gray, rose as I came through the door. I could see she was trembling—I had rarely seen any one laboring under such suppressed excitement.
"You wish to see me?" As the words were spoken I recognized that my tone was colder and more formal than perhaps the situation demanded. Unconsciously I seemed to interpose my voice as a protective barrier.
"Yes," came her tense, vibrant reply. She paused momentarily and then continued: "Yes, I wish to see the woman with whom my husband is in love."
Her surprising charge left me speechless. Indignation followed as I retorted sharply: "Surely you did not come here, Mrs. Early at this late hour to insult me."
Instead of answering she came over and studied me intently as though she were trying to place me in her mind. After a moment in which I stood silently awaiting the recognition I knew was sure to come she exclaimed:
"Why, it is the little eyes girl!" I stood mutely waiting for developments.
The fact that she had seen me earlier in the day, when Larry and I were roaring about the town with our hurdy-hurdy seemed to calm her somewhat. Her manner changed and she looked upon me with a friendlier eye than she had when I first came in.
"Oh my dear, my dear," she exclaimed, "I believe it was a benign omen that took me into that part of the city where you were away. I seldom go there but today wanted to get away from everyone else."
I think the expression of my face was my surprise. I had begun to be a little frightened. I wondered if she were really sane. She continued, "I wanted to get away from all the people with whom I had the slightest acquaintance for every one that I knew seemed happy. The fact was forced upon me that I was only a miserable woman on earth. I told the driver of my car to take me over beyond Fourth avenue, early." I said to myself, "over there will find someone who is perhaps as unhappy than I." And then there in the streets shimmering in the hot sunshine, I came upon you that charming boy. You were radiant with the joy of living—just out there in the sunshine. The children about you were happy too, I, who had come over there to make my misery less by beholding people who were more miserable than I was insensibly made happier in a glimpse of youth and happiness as I had never known.
I could see that Mrs. Early was on the verge of hysteria; that she was herself in any way; that probably the next morning she would be much ashamed of what she was saying. In her less trying hours she was evidently a woman who knew the value of reserve but just now she was consumed with hurt and jealousy and I could not stop her giving vent to her feelings. So I determined to let her talk, knowing that that was the greatest safety valve she could have in her present condition.

"I am so glad I stopped to talk to you this morning, because I know now that in your great happiness you will have an inclination to make me more happy. Why is it that neither Mr. Early nor Miss Belcher has ever spoken to me about the boy who is so much in love with you?"
"If you mean Larry Wheaton, Miss Early," I remarked, astounded at the trend of the conversation, "if you mean Larry," I repeated, "I do not think that he is really in love with me. He is a friend of my brother's, and I am older than he," I added somewhat lamely.
A spasm of pain crossed her face which made me realize that I had involuntarily hurt her and I hastened to add: "I expect I am that inevitable older woman that every boy thinks is his only love but is only the first love that prepares him for the real thing."
"Do not marry him, my dear. Whether you love him or not, do not marry him," she exclaimed, all excitement again. "A woman who marries a man who is younger than she makes the greatest of all life's mistakes."
"But Larry tells me that years do not count and everyone who has ever spoken of love has declared that the little girl has no age," I protested a little piqued that she should have so readily realized that I was older than Larry.
"Yes, I know they all say that," she answered wearily. "There is nothing new in the language of love. Men say the same words under the same circumstances to every woman with whom propinquity spells affinity.
Having seen me, I do not have to tell you that I am ten years older than Roland Early, but you can not know that for long years after my marriage I made use of every artifice of the toilette, I danced when I would rather have been in bed, I bought frocks for girls of sixteen thinking they might make me look that age and then I finally gave it all up. I knew it was futile. I could not make myself other than I was. My husband at that time made the excuse not only to his friends but to himself that I was ill. But he knew as well as I that I was only tired of it all and I could not pretend any longer. I made believe to accept his excuse and although I knew that he knew that I was perfectly well, I stayed at home and sank into a kind of self-inflicted invalidism.
"But even then I could not keep up when I knew that he had to love someone else and so tonight I have come here to tell you that my husband loves you."
Tomorrow—Mrs. Roland Early's Story.

Ban Placed On Smoking Within Olympic Forest

(News-Review Washington Bureau.)
WASHINGTON, July 6.—Smoking during periods of fire danger, on national forest lands within the cyclone swept area of the Olympic peninsula, Wash., has been prohibited on and after July 1, by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace in an amendment to the rules and regulations for the use and protection of the national forests. Exception to the smoking rule is made on improved camping grounds designated by the supervisor of the Olympic national forest, and improved places of human habitation.

The area covered by the no smoking order amounts to some 540,000 acres, and includes all of the Olympic national forest west of a line extending from the east end of Lake Crescent, southward a distance of approximately 45 miles to the east end of Lake Quinalt. The period of fire danger during which no smoking will be permitted is to be determined and publicly announced by the district forester at Portland, Oregon.

Great Danger of Fire.

The fire trap created by the cyclone of January 29, which swept the forests of the Olympic peninsula in a wind estimated to have reached 150 miles an hour, is the worst known in the history of the country. Over 6,750,000,000 feet of timber, on a strip 90 miles long and from 10 to 30 miles wide, was blown down by the storm and now lies in a tangled mass. The greatest damage was done on state and private lands; only about 1,000,000,000 feet of national forest timber being windthrown. Should fire ever gain headway in this devastated area foresters say that the most stupendous conflagration in the annals of the nation would result.

JULY CODLIN MOTH SPRAY.

The July spray for the codlin moth is now due and should be applied soon. This spray is for the second brood of the codlin moth and is important. The fruit should be entirely covered with the spray.

Better results will be secured by using a sprayer in this spray. Some of the Caseln brands will probably be all right, although Mischke oil has been used very successfully. If a sprayer is used three pounds of arsenate of lead to 200 gallons of water will be sufficient. If the sprayer is not used it will be safer to use four pounds to 200 gallons.

AT LEAST COULD BLAME WIFE

Herbert had a week's vacation from the office for the first time in two years and he was spending it at home. "Let's do the spring house-cleaning," his wife suggested. "It's using your vacation well, and later on I'd have to do it, anyway, so let's both clean the house."

So his first holiday was spent taking up the carpets. The next day, when he had finished that back-breaking task, she thanked him and gave him a carpet beater to use on the carpets.

And two days later, when that was done satisfactorily, she told him to mop and varnish the floors, whitewash the cellar and polish the furniture. And on the remaining days of his vacation he was bullied into painting the garden fence, mowing the lawn, digging up and planting again all the plants and flowers and laying a cement walk around the house.

Late in the afternoon of his last day's freedom from the office work the landlady called to see them. "Good afternoon," he began. "I just thought I'd drop in to tell you that the fire across the street, seeing you people cleaning up, smelling soap and new paint and things, coaxed her husband to buy this house. They want to move in next week and will offer you their old house as alternative accommodations. Good day!"

CRY CAME FROM HIS HEART

Theatrical Was by No Means Acting When He Gave Such Strong Vent to His Feelings.

Otis Skinner was recounting some of his experiences in "Kismet," not the motion-picture version but the stage play, in which he made such a big success all over the country a few years ago.

"I remember when we played Cincinnati," he said, "that we had trouble with our harem pool. We always tested it before the show and on this night, instead of the slightly heated water pouring through the pipes, it was jets of steam.

"We sent out and got all the ice we could procure, but even so, when the harem girls plunged in, they turned red as beets. A little later, I was called on to throw the grand vizier, Mr. Hamilton Revelle, into the pool.

"We had forgotten to tell him about the temperature, and when he struck the water he let out a yell that we thought would break up the show. But it didn't and you can imagine our surprise next day when the critics complimented Revelle on the spontaneous outcry he made when I threw him to his death."

Havre Port Undertaking.

A large job is about to be undertaken in connection with the deepening of the outer harbor of the French port of Le Havre. The scheme includes erecting and working, on both north and south sides of the outer harbor, transshipping berths, wharves, mooring buoys, raised earthworks, roadways, a dock for petroleum, gasoline and other inflammable hydrocarbons, a complete plant comprising both quayside and floating equipment for handling general goods, coal, heavy oils, petroleum, and gasoline, together with storage sheds, tanks and machinery; likewise, rails running along the quays and joining with the state railway.

It appears very much as though the French were going to make a strong bid for the world's shipping, judging by this and other extensive improvements in French ports.—Scientific American.

Who Controls Back of Seat?

"Say, take your coat off of my new hat!"
"My coat isn't on your hat. And if it is, you can just take your hat away. My coat's going to stay where it is!"
"You can put your coat on your lap. I'll call the usher."

That's the way the argument began between the two women in the movie theatre. The woman in front had dropped her coat over the back of her seat. The woman in back objected, because she had "parked" her new spring hat there.

But the question, who owns the back of the seat—the person who sits in the seat or the one behind—was left unsettled, because the owner of the coat moved to another seat.—New York Sun.

Sea May Reclaim Wayward Boys.

Believing that the lure of the sea might prove the winning appeal to boys who resist the conventional schooling of shore life, a Baltimore shipping expert proposes the establishment of a training ship at that port. Not only would such a school ship serve as a co-operative unit in the educational system of the city and state, but it would give additional marine training calculated to yield a supply of American sailors for the merchant vessels of the nation.—Popular Mechanics Magazine.
