Expert Says Boys Best Immigrants

WINNIPEG, Man., July 8.—(U. P.)—Boys make the best immigrants, according to T. E. Sedgwick of London, who is in Canada to find farm homes for boys from English cities.
Sedgwick has been engaged in finding farm homes for English city boys in the colonies of the British Empire since 1908. As the result of a personal visit to New Zealand, 50 farmers there agreed to take English boys to bring up on their farms. The boys were apprenticed to the farmers for three years. Their pay for the three years was deposited in a bank and at the end of their apprenticeship was turned over to them with the expense of their voyage deducted. The ages of the boys ranged from 16 to 20 years. The success of this experiment led to the establishment of several thousand English boys on farm homes in Australia. Three thousand boys were placed in Victoria, 1500 in New South Wales, 300 in South Australia and several hundred in Queensland.
"Boys," said Sedgwick, "are splendid advertisements. Their letters home exploit the attractions of their adopted country in glowing terms. They are more adaptable than adults. They absorb the traditions and customs of a new country. The usually marry a woman of the country, and after they bring out their parents and relatives to settle in the same neighborhood."
Sedgwick will endeavor to find homes for several hundred English boys among the farmers in the county of diversified agriculture in Canada.

Alicia Hammerly A Woman Who Wouldn't Remarry By Ish McChase Gibson The Real Wife

Mrs. Roland Early's Story.
"That is the second time you have made that statement, Mrs. Early," I asserted sharply, my indignation getting the upper hand as I asked myself by what right might this woman say to me that her husband was in love with me.
"Perhaps you will allow me to say to you that it is rather unusual for a woman to have the first intimation that a man is in love with her come from the lips of his wife."
For a long moment Mrs. Early looked me straight in the eye and I returned the glance, but there was no relief in her tone—rather its tremble promised hysterical tears when she said: "That he has not told you in so many words that you love me I can believe but that you have had no idea that my husband is in love with you can not be true. You are a clever woman, Mrs. Hammerly, and you know as well as I that a woman recognizes even before a man when he is in love with her. And, being a widow, you should know that a man of Roland Early's temperament would not ask you out to dine with him the second time if he did not have more than a passing interest in you. Roland Early is not going to brave the speech of people for whom he cares so much, except under some great emotion or for some selfish desire."
While Mrs. Early was tacitly accusing me of dining too often with her husband I knew that she was right, for it came to me all at once that Mr. Early had dropped into the habit of dining or luncheon with me once or twice a week ever since he had returned from Chicago.
Suddenly I remembered my own feelings when I was torn by the pangs of what I recognized in this woman as jealousy and my heart gave that same sickening little throb that I had had that far-away day I found my husband walking home with Nell Marshall.
Instinctively I tried to excuse myself. "I am sorry, Mrs. Early, if you think that I should not have accepted your husband's invitations to luncheons and dinners, but surely you must know that inviting the people from the office to dine with him is one of Mr. Early's pleasant little habits. He has always said that he was free to talk over that person's particular work away from the office."
"Has he never invited you to his home, Mrs. Hammerly?"
The indignant blood rushed to my face.
"Has any other woman in the office, except Alice Gordon been invited to your home, Mrs. Early? Every woman on the staff has dined with him at one time or another. He explained to me that you were an invalid and saw no one but your oldest friends."
"The same old story," Mrs. Early whispered to herself wearily.
"Pardon. What did you come to me for, Mrs. Early? You must have something you wish me to do or you would not make a visit at this inopportune time."
I knew that I was cruel. I knew this woman did not really mean all that she was implying and some way I had a great sympathy for her for I knew exactly what she was suffering and she had suffered for many, many years. And yet for the life of me I could not help but be indignant at her assumption of an affair-between her husband and myself.
"You must have something you wish me to do," I repeated for she was silent.
She drew her breath quickly as though gathering courage. "Yes," she said, "I do want to ask of you a very great favor. I want you to give me back my husband."
"Are you mad, Mrs. Early? What do you mean?"
"I want you to give me back my husband," she reiterated in a flat toneless voice as a child would repeat a lesson it had learned by long study. I knew immediately that this was the sentence that had burned itself into her consciousness until she had gathered courage to come to me and say it.
"But say dear Mrs. Early, I have never had your husband. Don't you understand that if he be no longer yours, you must have lost him long before he ever knew me."
"No, I do not think so. Many times before he has been interested in other women but something has always happened that made him return to me and tell me that I was, after all, the only woman who understood him, the only woman upon whose understanding he could rest. Lately he has been entirely different. He has hardly spoken to me for days at a time and the other day he asked me to divorce him."
"What are you saying?" I asked in horror. "Surely you are making some mistake. No decent man goes to a woman who has been his loving and devoted wife for many years and asks her to divorce him."
"You read the newspapers, don't you, Mrs. Hammerly?" she asked, faintly. "Not a day passes that they do not contain stories of men who have tired for one reason or another, of their old wives, and want to exchange them for new ones. I sometimes wonder if women are more constant than men—if the tradition that women love but once and men as often as there are times, places and circumstances, is not really a fact. Roland Early is my first, last and only love, Mrs. Hammerly. I can not stop loving him, even though I suspect now, that he really married me through a mistaken sense of gratitude and an idea of paying a debt of honor. Surely if he had really loved me he could not have told me with so little emotion, as he did day before yesterday, that he had found a woman he felt he could not live without. He asked me to give him a divorce and let him go to her."
"But, Mrs. Early, what made you think that woman was I?" I asked in consternation.
Tomorrow—Strange Request.

ADVICE TO LOVELORN AND OTHERS

BY MRS. ELLSBURY
A Daily Column of Questions and Answers Conducted by a Woman Who Knows. Address your Letters to Mrs. Ellsbury Care Roseburg News-Review.

Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: I was a member of the movies until three months ago when I came to Roseburg from Los Angeles. I attend church here and do everything that is right. When I walk down the street I attract people's attention and everyone stops to stare at me. When I go anywhere people refuse to have anything to do with me. Do you suppose it is because I am very beautiful or because I am an actress and dress the same as I did in L. A.? Any advice you would give me I would appreciate very much.
B. D. Roseburg.
A. I think perhaps you are self-conscious and paying too much attention of other people as you walk down the street or attend church. If you dress in the freakish manner I have seen affected by some motion picture actresses, especially when they come to a small town, I cannot blame them for staring at you. It is natural for you to want to dress well and you should continue to do so but avoid overdoing it so that people will stare at you. Most people like to look at a well-dressed young girl but their stares will not make you uncomfortable unless there is something freakish or vulgar about your attire. Examine yourself and be sure that you have not been conceited about people watching you.
Dear Mrs. Ellsbury: I have read several books of Miss L. M. Montgomery, and am quite interested in her. She wrote "Anne of Green Gables" and other "Anne" books. Is she still alive. If so will you please give me her address.
