

WHERE BRASSIES LIFT BALL AGAINST BACKGROUND OF PRIMEVAL WILDERNESS

BEYOND THE LINKS

TORONTO, ONT.—Playing golf on the wilderness links of Ontario makes one feel contemporary with the aboriginal past. Forests hem in the links with perhaps a gem-like lake to be glimpsed among the trees. The ancient and honorable game was never played in a more beautiful environment.

Summer crowds will soon begin to pour into the scores of resorts along the Grand Trunk Railway—Muskoka and Kawartha Lakes, French River, Norway Point, Lake of Bays, Algonquin Park, Belleville, Trenton, Cobourg, Port Hope and the Rideau Lakes. Comfortable hotels await the tourist in a land left untouched by encroaching civilization.

One may leave a game of billiards and before a cigarette is half-burned, find himself in a wilderness that is the same today as before the white man came. This is one of the chief charms of these convenient resorts within a few hours' run of New York or Chicago. One may enjoy the daintiest of Parisian cookery and breathe in pine-scented breezes blowing across a hundred leagues of forest solitude.

One may find absolute rest in absolute silence among these lakes and woods. One may live in a cottage or in a hotel. One may indulge in golf, tennis, canoeing, swimming, fishing, camping, and hikes along Indian trails into "far forest depths. There is no better fishing in America. Trout, bass, pickerel, pike and muskellunge furnish abundant sport.

Roland Early's Strange Suggestion.

"No, don't try to stop me, Alix," said Roland Early as I turned to him to speak. "I know that my honesty in telling you these things is not pleasant. Truth rarely is, but for once—not because I have nothing to lose, but just because I have so much to lose—I am going to put truth to the test. I will admit that I would much rather love my wife than you. She has many lovable qualities. If I could explain even to myself why I do not love her perhaps I could transfer my love from you to her, but there is no tangible explanation for love. It is an aroma, a light in the eye, a parting of the lips, or any other bit of sense appeal upon which to hang an illusion. Only God knows what it is or why it is or where it is. We mortals only know when we have found it."

I had not been able to say a word. Even more impassioned had been Roland Early in his explanations and his protestations than had been his wife. But I did not pity him just as I had his wife—their lives were such a game of false purposes. At last when I was able to speak I said in a voice colder than I should have used had I not been so greatly moved:

"All that you say Mr. Early, may be true, but why do you say it to me? I have not found that intangible thing which you speak of. I do not love you. I do not want to love you, for with your own words you have passed judgment upon yourself and condemned to unhappiness any woman who might be unfortunate enough to marry you. It is your unfortunate fate that you shall forever be the wandering Jew in the land of love."

"You are like many others in this world. You have all your life eaten your cake voraciously and yet wanted it tremendously—after you have eaten it."

"I shall never want it again, Alix, if you satisfy my longing. What matters it if my wife will not divorce me. Surely the world is wide and there are other places far away from all the people that we know; from all the comment of friends and foes alike, where we will be happier than it is possible to imagine. Come with me, dear heart, and I will devote my life to your happiness."

"You should know that devotion of the lover does not make the loved one happy, Mr. Early. You are offering me the same thing that your wife has given you, but after what you have said to me it seems that you should understand that devotion does not begot love, neither does it begot happiness for either the loved or the lover."

"You are for the moment mad, Mr. Early, and if I should accede to your request after you had reached sanity again you would hate me. It seems to me that you have two distinct identities. I cannot understand, otherwise, the type of a man that looks upon unconventional, youthful but purely innocent prank with horror as you looked upon my day's gypsy jaunt about the city with Larry, and the man who would ask a woman he protests he loves better than life, to countenance the suggestion you have made."

"Oh, you good women, you good women. Not one of you has the slightest conception of the nature of a man. Will you never understand that the hero is not all good and the villain is never wholly bad. Human beings fluctuate like the pendulum between good and evil. You are always prating about virtue, but you forget the meaning of the word.

"Virtue once stood for the good that was in a human being regardless of the evil that might be there also. You forget that there are always tares among the oats, my dear."

"To be blameless is not to be virtuous. One may be blameless and do nothing. Nothing to blame may mean also nothing to praise. 'All modern humanity has said in the language of the streets: 'Don't be a clam, and yet if to be blameless is all that is necessary to be good, a clam is one of the best of created things. A clam does nothing to make anyone unhappy, but by the same token a clam does nothing as long as he lives to make anything or anybody happy. It is only when the clam is forcibly taken from its own habitat and made to give up its life by some ruthless, selfish human being that it adds anything to the joy of living."

I must have looked somewhat uncertain as to his meaning, for Mr. Early explicated: "What I am trying to say, Alix, is that a man may be called virtuous when he is only apathetic and he may get a reputation for vice when he is only very honest."

"All of which, Mr. Early, brings us nowhere. You have been dramatizing yourself and your emotions, not for my benefit, but for the benefit of convincing yourself that your course is right. You have been making literature, I grant, but I am not sure that you have been describing human nature—the commonplace human nature we call normal."

"Yes, I knew, my dear, I have been letting myself go. For once I have talked to another just as I have thought to myself. For once I have said what I would not even dare to put on paper, because I knew that you would understand. Oh, Alix, surely you do care for me a little. Fate could not be so cruel to me as to deny you to me, some place, somewhere, some time."

"It is not fate, Mr. Early, but yourself that stands in the way. I could never love a man of your temperament in the way you are asking me to love you. In fact, I am almost sure that it would be impossible for me to love any man with the kind of love you have described. Perhaps I do not deserve any credit for being good simply because I have never seen anything that really tempted me to be otherwise. You know the virtue of the untempted woman is unassailable."

Roland Early slumped down in his chair as I continued: "You will understand, of course, that under the circumstances I will not be able to retain my position in your office."

"What do you mean, Alix? Are you going to go out of my life entirely?"

"I shall go as far out of your life as I am able. My serial story has several months longer to run, as you know, and I shall be glad to submit to you any manuscript that I may have in the future, but you must surely see how impossible would be our meeting day by day after this."

Tomorrow—Roland Early's Collapse.

The concrete foundation is being put in this week for McKay Brothers fruit packing and grading plant on First avenue, near the S. P. freight depot. The construction contract has been let to J. C. P. spur track to the building was made Wednesday and the rails will be put in next week.

By the overturning of a car in which they were riding Tuesday morning, Elmer Ferris, Lee Selleck and James Splawn were all somewhat bruised and shaken up. The trio were on Central avenue east of town when the mishap occurred, and was due to inexperience in driving. The car went into a ditch and was overturned.

One of these six types of oil fits your engine perfectly

High quality alone does not make an oil the right lubricant for your car.

An oil must be of the right type (viscosity) to meet the demands of your lubrication system, engine speed, piston-ring clearance, etc.

The wrong type of good oil will damage your engine and reduce its power just as quickly as a poor-quality oil.

SUNOCO Motor Oil is made in six distinct types—not just three or four—to guarantee a right oil for each car.

SUNOCO eliminates carbon troubles and protects you against repair bills. We will tell you which type fits your car.
