Dinner For Six.

When Mr. Early said that he was just about to call me, I hastened to interrupt, for I knew that Bab was right in her forecast that he was going to invite me to dinner and I wanted to be the first to extend the invitation.

Not waiting for him to say why he was calling me, I said: "I want to tell you, Mr. Early, that my sister, Barbara, whom you have met, and her newly acquired husband, Mr. Duane Benton—I think you also met him when you were in my home—came unexpectedly for a short stay with me this morning. I have been told that Mrs. Early's health is so much improved that she is going out a bit, and I wondered if she would waive ceremony and that you both would take dinner with my brother, sister and myself this evening at the Hotel."

There was a moment's silence and I seemed to see Mr. Early at the other end of the wire, gulping for breath. Then he answered, "It is a strange coincidence, but I must tell you, Mrs. Hammersly, that I had intended calling you up this morning to say that Mrs. Early wanted you to dine with us this evening. And because we are going away tomorrow and the house is somewhat upset, she told me to ask if you would mind dining at the Hotel instead of at our home."

"Then everything is all right," I supplemented. "I shall expect you and Mrs. Early tonight at 8 o'clock at the Hotel."

"With pleasure, Mrs. Hammersly. May I make a suggestion: Could we not have dinner a little earlier and then all of you could go as my guests to see some play?"

"Thank you so much; that would be splendid," I quickly accepted, as I felt that the play might help to pass the hour or two after dinner, which, notwithstanding Bab's optimistic prophecies, might otherwise be rather trying.

"I will call Mrs. Early immediately and introduce myself and give her the invitation," I said.

"Oh you need not do that; I will tell her," hastily interposed Mr. Early. I know that she is just at present downtown doing some shopping. She intends to call at the office before she returns home and I can tell her then. I can safely say that she will be glad to come. She has long wanted to know you."

"I hope Miss Belcher heard Mr. Early's side of the conversation," I said to myself as I hung up the phone and went back to Bab.

"You were right, Bab. He had intended to invite me to dine with his wife and himself. I was not able to guess from his conversation whether he had told her that he knew that she had visited me yesterday."

"This promises to be a very amusing party," said Bab gleefully. "Now you must call up Mr. Henderson and tell him that you want him to be sure to come to dinner with you and Duane and myself tonight."

Probably Duane has not delivered your casual invitation yet."

"I do not know whether Mr. Henderson and the Earlys are acquainted," I was beginning to expostulate when I remembered that I had often seen Mr. Henderson bow to Mr. Early when we were together.

"I do not like calling up a business man at his office," I again objected.

Bab would take no excuse and she said: "Then I will call up Duane. I know he is at Mr. Henderson's office, and have him invite Mr. Henderson."

She went to the phone and in a few minutes I heard her say: "Duane this is Bab. Mr. and Mrs. Early are leaving town tomorrow, and naturally Alice wants us to meet them before they go, so she is giving a little dinner at the Hotel tonight, and she wants you to ask Mr. Henderson to come if he has no other engagement."

There was silence for a moment or two and then Bab called: "Come to the phone, Alice. Mr. Henderson wants to talk to you."

"Good morning, Mrs. Hammersly," I heard as I placed the receiver to my ear. "I could not resist the pleasure of hearing your voice again as well as thanking you for your invitation to the dinner tonight. I shall be glad to dine with your brother and sister and you may be sure that I will let nothing keep me from coming to your party. I am wondering if later you would not accompany me to a play."

"I have already accepted Mr. Early's invitation to some play for all of us."

"Are the Earlys to be at the party?"

"I detected a note of surprise in Mr. Henderson's voice."

"Yes. Didn't Duane tell you? You see, Mr. and Mrs. Early are going away tomorrow and I wanted my sister and brother to meet them."

"I am glad Mrs. Early is again well enough to go out and will be present. I will put off my theater party until later. Thank you so much for thinking of me."

"Then until tonight at seven," I replied as I hung up.

I confess I was a little disturbed by Mr. Henderson's reference to Mrs. Early. Had he also heard the gossip?

"Oh," said Bab, "what did you hang up for? I wanted to talk to Duane again."

"My dear Bab, here is where your understanding of male psychology is at fault. Always be the first to say goodbye whether by letter, phone or word of mouth. If you want to retain your hold upon any man's interest."

"Did you ask Mr. Henderson to bring his wife?" asked Bab suddenly.

"No, I did not. Has he got a wife?"

"I am sure I don't know. That is what I wanted to ask Duane and you shut off the phone."
