Abbie Hammerly A Woman Who Wouldn't Remarry

By Ida McGee Gibson
The Red Wolf

THE BUTTERFLY DANCER.

As we sat down after the dance the chorus came on with a rush. "I sometimes think I am growing old," said Mrs. Early as we watched that kaleidoscope of smiling girls ever changing in color and form.

From the expression on Bab's face I knew she was thinking "Why does that woman always harp upon that self-same string of age?" I shared the thought with my sister. But Bab asked politely: "What brings the age question into your mind, Mrs. Early, at this moment?"

"I presume," answered Mrs. Early, "it is because it is impossible for me to see in one of these 'girl shows,' as they are called, the artistic beauty that my husband raves about."

Mr. Early looked rather uncomfortable, but he rose to his own defense.

"I do not rave about them, my dear. I simply accept the so-called 'girl show' as put-out by the American producer as the most poetical and interesting exposition of sex on earth. Those girls are absolutely soulless, but, taken as purely sensuous pictures, they certainly fill the eye with sheer beauty."

"I confess," Judge Turner interjected, "that I agree in a way with Mrs. Early and I am satisfied that it is not because I am growing old. For I do not think there is anything more beautiful on earth than a beautiful woman and yet I do not care for that feminine beauty that is simply a glorification of sex. I am not wholly obsessed with the allure of youth. Age, too, has its beauties."

"What are you going to have to eat?" interrupted Mr. Early. He asked the question of the whole party, but he turned to me.

"I am going to have a bowl of milk and some bread to break into it."

"That's unheard of in this place. But it is easy to see how you keep your complexion," said Mrs. Early.

"I am not thinking about my complexion but about my stomach," I explained.

"I don't think you are very polite," said Duane, "to order bread and milk. It keeps all of us from bolting up our fried bodies with a highball. You must remember that Bab and I were traveling all night and we have been on the go all this day."

"I am very sorry," said Mr. Early stiffly, "that my leaving the city tomorrow made it impossible for me to entertain you at any other evening than this."

"I hope they come to blows," remarked Judge Turner to me in a humorous undertone.

"I am sure, Roland, that if Mr. Benton wants a highball he should have it," said Mrs. Early. "He really must be very tired."

"Of course we'll all have one," said Judge Turner. "Prohibition has not been made a law yet."

"That's right. Leave me in peace with my bread and milk. I had an idea when I ordered it that it was a declaration of independence that every one would follow."

"In the meantime," said Judge Turner, "come and dance with me." I found Judge Turner quite as splendid a dancer as Mr. Henderson and I was quite surprised that I could dance so well with him, as I felt like a child in his arms. He never spoke a word to me through the entire dance and I was soothed and calmed by the motion and at its end I felt quite myself.

"At last I see the happiness in your eyes again," said the judge as he led me to my seat.

Mr. Henderson had been dancing with Bab. Duane was talking with Mrs. Early and Mr. Early had gone across to another table to greet some friends. Once more we seated ourselves, but in a little different position than before. Mr. Early was between me and his wife with Judge Turner on the other side of me. Henderson and Duane were on either side of Bab.

"Look at that girl at the end. The one with the red balloons," exclaimed Duane suddenly. "Did you ever see anything so beautiful in your life?"

We all turned to get a better look at her. She was fairy-like in proportions—a creature of star-dust and gossamer. Her tiny toes scarcely touched the floor and it seemed as though the rainbow balloons which were swinging above her head would take her off her feet. Her soft draperies of chiffon floated about her like prismatic color in which there was no tangible web. Her childish golden hair curled about her face and in the innocent depths of her blue eyes was the wondering and somewhat frightened gaze of a fairy taken from her silvan environment and thrown into the blais and jangling music of the mortal world.

"Do you suppose any one could be as innocent as that girl looks?" asked Mrs. Early.

"Yes," answered Bab quickly. "In my dictionary innocence means lack of knowledge, not necessarily purity. That girl is quite as fairy-like in her mind as she is in her appearance. She is as unconscious of morals as a butterfly."

"Well, she certainly is a beautiful creature," I agreed, "even if she is as soulless and irresponsible as a butterfly."

Nearer and nearer to our table came the girl with a set smile upon her face. She seemed to have no realization of the people for whom she was dancing. Lightly she touched, here and there, a man with a balloon which she detached from her costume, and he attempted to strike the toy with his burning cigar or cigarette, making them burst with a loud reverberation.

"If she is not careful," said Bab suddenly as she danced in front of the table next to ours, "that man is going to set her draperies afire with that lighted match." The man in question was holding a lighted match carelessly while he waited to finish his conversation with the woman next to him.

"My God! That is just what he has done!"

There was a horrified groan from all over the crowded room as the fire leaped up about the girl—and then a most agonizing scream as the flames touched the soft flesh.

Two Bulls Clash
And One Is Killed

This is no bull. We'll admit it sounds very much like it, but a well known resident of Canyonville vouches for the veracity of the story.

Two bulls, weighing over one ton each, engaged in a fight to the finish in Canyonville Saturday and the battle lasted for over three hours. During the fierce fighting the natives of that district gathered around the lot and obtained all the thrills of a Tia Juana combat. One of the huge animals, the property of Mr. McGee, succeeded in killing its opponent at the end of the three hours struggle. The animal was literally mashed by the "bull rushes."

Jack Holt and Hedda Nova have the leading roles in the George H. Hamilton presentation produced by Col. Wm. N. Sellig "The Mask" which has been booked for an engagement at the Antlers theater tonight.

This picture was directed by Bertram Bracken, who recently directed the James Oliver Curwood story, "Kazan" for Hamilton and who also produced "Harriet and the Piper," starring Anita Stewart, for Louis B. Mayer.

Jack Holt plays a dual role, that of twin brothers, in "The Mask," which is a powerful story of love, adventure and intrigue by Arthur Hornblow. Other members of the cast include such well known screen artists as Fred Malatesta, Harry Lombdale, Byron Munson, Jantee Wilson, William Clifford and little Mickey Moore.

The story deals with the fortunes of Kenneth Traynor, who leaves his wife for Africa on a business mission. There he comes into possession of an enormous diamond and meets his peerless twin brother, "Handsome Jack." When Kenneth is believed lost in a ship disaster Handsome Jack attempts to pass himself off as the husband of his brother's wife, and a most extraordinary situation is evolved.

Playgoers, who like Carmel Myers' unusual roles will be delighted with the star as she appears in "The Kiss" her latest Universal photodrama, to be shown at the Majestic theater tonight.

The story presents her as Little Erolinda, the characterization made famous by Johnston McCulley in his widely read story of that name, and its theme is based upon the heroic exploits of early Californians who fought as gallantly as they love.

Jack Conway, selected by Universal, to direct the production, was careful to stage the picture on the actual locale of the original story and for that purpose used many of the old haciendas which links to modern California the romantic traditions of the past.

Enacting heroic roles in this picturesque romance will be seen such screen favorites as William E. Lawrence, the leading man, George Periolat, P. J. Lockney, J. J. Laneo, Jean Acker, Harvey Clarke and Edward Brady.
