

"NOW-A-DAYS"

says the Good Judge

A man can get a heap more satisfaction from a small chew of this class of tobacco, than he ever could get from a big chew of the old kind. He finds it costs less, too. The good tobacco taste lasts so much longer he doesn't need to have a fresh chew nearly as often.

Any man who uses the Real Tobacco Chew will tell you that.

BAB'S DECREE.
"It is time to go to the boat," said Tom Latham at last. "Are you going with me, Alix, to bid Duane goodbye?"

"Yes," I replied, shuddering, despite myself, at the thought of all that had happened.

"What is the matter? Are you faint?" demanded Tom with concern.

"I think it must be the heat."

"You are as pale as a ghost."

"Well, you know, Tom it breaks my heart to say goodbye to Duane. I have always been very fond of him. I have really cared as much for Duane Benton as I have for my brother Bart."

Again Tom proved his understanding, for we rode to the dock without a word.

We found Duane awaiting us. He, too, was paler than I had ever seen him, while his lips were drawn almost into a snarl across his strong, white teeth.

I went forward silently and took his hand but he gathered me up in his arms and pressed me close to him, convulsively.

"Many times he kissed me as he said brokenly: 'You do care for me, don't you, Alix? You do not think that I am wholly bad?'"

"Oh, my dear Duane, I think you are one of the best men in all the world."

Again he kissed me and I understood, of course, that it was not I whom he was kissing—it was Bab, the woman he had loved; the woman who had been his wife; the woman he still loved; the woman he was leaving forever.

"Men are like that. They close their eyes and imagine that the woman in their arms is the woman in their hearts," commented Tom Latham as I told him afterward of the feeling that I had when Duane was bidding me goodbye.

I shall never forget how Duane looked as he stood at the rail as the boat put out to sea. It was the figure of a man to whom ambition and hope were strangers.

For a moment I felt that my sister had much for which to answer and I almost hated her.

Even my own life-story which Duane was carrying to Judge Turner in a far-off land, seemed nothing beside the events that had ultimately led up to that tragic figure outlined against the darkening sky.

"My God," murmured Tom Latham under his breath and I knew by that sign that Duane's vanishing form meant to him what it meant to me.

Tom's hand stole over and caught mine and he whispered, though he might have shouted without fear of his words reaching Duane: "I wish your sister Bab were here."

My only answer was to press the hand which covered mine. I determined to go back to shore as quickly as possible and draw for Bab the vivid picture of Duane—a picture I shall never forget.

When I arrived I went directly to Bab's room. I found her quite as tragic a figure as the one that had sailed away from me a few hours earlier.

Yet I could not be very sympathetic although her face was swollen from weeping and her hands trembled as she held out to me a formidable, forbidding looking document with red seals on it.

"There it is, Alix. Look at it. Oh, I never thought Duane would treat me like this."

"I expect it was because I was so wrought up myself that I was hysterical. I sat down and laughed—laughed until I cried."

Bab turned to me in perfect fury.

"I have heard of heartless women, but I never thought one could be as heartless as you, my own sister, are at this moment. Go away from me. Leave me alone. Everyone in the world is against me. My husband—oh I have no husband. He wanted me to separate from him."

Again she held out to me the legal document and then her mood suddenly changed. She fell on her knees beside me. "Oh, Alix, Oh, Alix, I didn't think he would do it."

"Didn't think he would do what?"

"Give me this." And she thrust the decree of divorce into my hand.

Knowing what I did the paper fairly burned my fingers and almost unconsciously I dropped it to the floor.

"There is no understanding you, Bab. You wanted a divorce, and now that you have it you are not satisfied."

"But don't you see, Alix, that I did not really want a divorce. I wanted Duane to say that he loved me so much that he would not give me a divorce."

"I never thought he would do it," she wailed again.

"And so to please your own pretty vanity, you held out. Bab, I am afraid you will make me dislike you in the end. It is women like you, women who pretend to be good women, who make men believe all women are either fools or vampires."

"Oh, Alix, I want him back! I want him back!"

I realized that she had not heard a word that I had been saying but I answered roughly: "Well, you will have hard work getting him back. He sailed three hours ago for the other end of the world and no one knows when he will come back. I think he is saying in his own heart that he will remain away forever."

Bab's eyes opened wide. She seemed to have lost the power to speak. For a moment I thought she was dying, and then she dropped in a pathetic little heap at my feet.

FARMERS STUDY DEHYDRATION

A good many Oregon farmers interested in economy and standardization of dehydrated fruits and vegetables are getting copies of blueprints of the Oregon tunnel dryer with improvements by E. H. Weigand, head of the agricultural college experiment station hort products work. Some of the Weigand improvements that make possible the 400 to 450 lineal feet per minute of air circulation in the prune dryer are shortening the tunnel to 20 to 22 feet, furnace chamber 12 to 14 feet deep, fresh air intake as large as furnace chamber, opening from furnace chamber to tunnel width of tunnel and at least 4 feet long, stack opening to sum of areas between trays, low enough stack not to cause condensation of moisture in air, large radiating surface in furnace chamber, maximum of our tunnels to each chamber. Although the print commercially would be expensive, only a nominal sum—75 cents—is charged farmers by the station department. Send to O. A. C. Experiment station, Corvallis.

RUST PROOF TIMOTHY FOUND.

The search for rust-resistant timothy, vigorous and productive enough to put Oregon and the northwest back on the map as a timothy growing section has been rewarded at the O. A. C. experiment station. In early days thousands of tons were grown to where one is now produced. The decay of the crop was due chiefly to rust, which completely wiped out large areas. The farmers wanted timothy for forage purposes and the college station has been working many years for a strain that would stand the attack. Better quality and higher yield were also sought. The best strains from the world-wide markets were obtained and bred by selection in hills, rows, plots, and entire fields. This strain is profitable in grass mixtures and with red clover. These rust resistant strains are expected to prove valuable as seed crop, as timothy is a free seeder.
