THE MORNING AFTER

"Haven't you been able to find Herb, Ria?" I called the next morning as I heard her again at the telephone.

"No. I called every place possible last night. I did not stop until after 1 o'clock. I am now calling the club again. They told me at his home that he might be there. He has not been at home all night. Where do you suppose he is, Virgie? I must find him!"

"Then the phone rang again and I heard her say in a relieved tone: 'Is that you, Herbert? This is Ria. I have been trying steadily for twenty-four hours to get you. Oh, do come over here immediately. I must see you.' She stopped a moment, evidently listening to something he was saying.

"Never mind about saying nice things to me. How soon can you be over?"

Evidently he was coming at once, for Ria answered: "All right, Virgie and I will be up and ready to see you."

The receiver went back on the hook with a bang and I heard hurried preparations for dressing as Ria called to me from her room: "Herb will be here in a half hour and you must be ready for him."

"All right. I am almost dressed now. I already have the coffee on. I am quite sure that a cup of good coffee will be good for him. He probably has not slept any more than you have."

By the time Herbert came we were ready and I had set the table for three. There was a fragrant aroma from the coffee and I had put a glass of orange juice at each place.

I rather smiled to myself as I thought that all this preparation came from Aunt Virginia's teaching. When any one was in trouble, cross or sick, her first thought was that that they should have some kind of food delicately served. For a very spiritual woman, Aunt Virginia had some most materialistic theories, and they usually worked out well.

Ria heard Herb coming and opened the door before he had time to knock.

I heard the tones of low voices—tones in which both tragedy and carresses blended—and then Ria dragged him in to me.

I was shocked at the sight of Herbert Richardson's face. His skin seemed drawn parchment-like over his face, which was the color of ivory. His lips were dry and pale and he frequently moistened them. His hands trembled as I took them in mine.

"Sit down and have some hot coffee, dear. When did you eat last?"

"I don't know," he answered dully. Ria poured his coffee and although he protested he could not eat, he did them to go with me. Should I? S. Answer: That is as good a way to meet girls as any. The next time you go to a dance, dance with one of the girls you have met before, and ask to take her home. If you take her home you can then ask her if she would care to go to a show with you some night. You can scarcely expect them to be anything but distant to a stranger.

taste the hot, crisp, buttered toast I put upon his plate. Tasting, he found he was hungry and apparently without thought of what he was doing he ate two pieces as he drank his coffee and explained the situation to us.

Aunt Virginia was right. However much one sorrows, however much one fears, a sense of physical well-being alleviates matters greatly.

"What is this we hear about Kitty Dalton?" asked Ria tremulously. "Have you heard about her from any one else?" demanded Herb quickly.

"Yes. There was a policeman here last night threatening to arrest us."

"What?"

"Oh, don't worry about that. We did not say anything and the man went away after telling us to be available when wanted. He told us, though, that it looked as though poor Kitty was going blind."

"Isn't it horrible? I haven't the slightest idea where Kitty got that bad liquor. You know, Ria, my cellar is full of straight stuff."

"Yes, I know it only too well," replied Gloria in a voice which rebuked Herb more than harsh words could have done.

Herb raised his hand as though to tell her he could bear no more and then continued: "Fred must have had some of the stuff in his hip pocket. When Ria protested having drinks on the table at dinner, Fred went out several times. Just before we left the Turkish Village for the bungalow, he excused himself for a few minutes, and he must have had his flask refilled. No one has been able to locate him. I spent last night searching for him. He disappeared immediately after we took Kitty to the hospital. Of course you girls know that this is the truth, but I would never be able to convince a jury of it."

"What do you mean, Herbert?" asked Ria, so startled that her voice rose almost to a scream.

"I mean that the officer told you the truth. Kitty probably will be blind. If she is, I will be arrested."

Ria's head dropped in her arms on the table. Her body was shaken with sobs. Herbert got up quickly, overturning his chair as he went around the table and fairly lifted her in his arms.

"Don't, Ria! Don't! I cannot stand it if it makes you suffer, too. Isn't it enough that I have come a cropper for myself; that I have in some way helped to ruin the life of that foolish, unthinkable girl over there at the hospital? Oh, I know I am not technically to blame," he said as Ria lifted her head in contradiction, "but morally I am, and if I make you suffer, it will be the last straw."
