The Thrilling and Dramatic Story of Virginia Fairfax's Ambition!

At the Studio.

"Virgie, it is seven o'clock!" I awakened at the sound of Gloria's voice and, as I slowly opened my eyes, my nostrils were tempted with the fragrance of coffee. "Have I been asleep?" I asked foolishly.

"Of course, silly—so soundly that you didn't hear the telephone which awakened me. You will have to hurry, dear, or you will be late."

"Herb called half an hour ago and apologized for waking me so early. I hadn't been asleep, but I didn't tell him so."

"Is anything the matter? What did Herb want so early?" "Why—he merely said he wanted to bid me good morning," and Ria blushed furiously.

"How stupid of me," I thought, but I said nothing. Gloria changed the subject with: "I feel sure I won't get away with Kitty today. I'll be here tonight and tell you all that has happened."

"Soon I was ready to leave for the studio. At the door Gloria took my hand warmly, saying: "Virginia, I feel nearer to you than to any one I have ever known. You will let me keep you in my life, won't you?"

"Why, of course, Gloria. I want you for a friend always. We mustn't let your marriage separate us. And I need you, Gloria, far more than you do me. Had I known just what life in the movies was going to be, I would not have dared to come to California."

"Yes, you would, dear. You have the courage which faces obstacles and the ambition to surmount them. But hurry, child," ordered Ria abruptly, "before I dissolve in tears."

Two tears quivered radiantly in her eyes and she threw her arms about my neck. My cheek was wet where it pressed against hers as I said: "Goodbye."

Ruth Drayton met me at the entrance gate. She looked rather pale and worn. "Oh, I am so glad I am not late," she said. "Ralph coughed all night and kept me awake although he insisted there was nothing I could do for him. I want you to come home with me as soon as you can. Ralph, poor dear, doesn't understand why I got a part when I had only been here a day or two. I told him it was pure luck, but he doesn't believe me."

"I just can't stand it, Virginia. If he adds jealousy to our other troubles."

Her face hardened a little, contradicting her words, and the sight of it brought a wave of pity to my heart for Ralph, Drayton lying there alone.

"All ready, girls!" My heart leaped at the tones of Tommy Warner's voice. He seemed to be the one person that I could cling to.

"Miss Drayton, we will want you first."

I was really glad to see her go. Just why I could not tell, but I wanted to be alone for a few moments to free my mind of all the trouble and worry of my own personal affairs and get into the feeling for my part.

And then I had to smile, for I realized that I had no part to play—that I was dramatizing myself even to quoting that expressive old line of "getting into the skin of my part," which I had read in some book of the stage.

Tommy found time to whisper after I got onto the set: "I don't think anybody is on, do you, Virgie? There wasn't a word in the morning papers. I will call up the hospital at noon and find out about Kitty."

Tommy's words did more to settle me than anything else could have done. I was glad when work started and, with a crowd of others, I went, through what was required of me, dancing when it was necessary to have a background, with Jack Thompson and stepping all over his feet. "I must learn to dance," I thought again.

Twice I saw the director talking with Tommy and shaking his head. I knew he was finding some fault with me.

I could not keep my eyes off Ruth Drayton. She played Ria's little part with an assurance that made me understand that stage technique was indispensable.

I remarked this to the young woman standing beside me and she answered sarcastically: "Where do you get that stuff? Ruth Drayton was two seasons in the follies. That doesn't make an actress of her, does it?"

"Pretty nearly. At least she knows how to keep in the picture. She knows how to stand, how to carry herself and what effect a certain gesture will have upon her audience. I wish I had had her training."

It came to me then, forcibly, that if I succeeded it would be by almost hard work. I didn't know how to dance; I had almost concluded that I did not know how to stand. But I could enter a room gracefully and seat myself. That had been taught me by Aunt Virginia, and was more of an accomplishment than it sounds.

I moved nearer to a place from which I could study the Ruth Drayton scene. To my surprise, I found that it annoyed her. It was weeks afterward before I realized that she was suspicious of every one; that she was afraid every one was trying to supplant her. It was then I knew that while Ruth Drayton might be a good motion picture actress she would never be a great one.
