Endorse Beals As a Director

The Riddle Enterprise has the following to say regarding the candidacy of D. S. Beals for director of the Oregon Growers:

Practically every member of the Oregon Growers with whom the editor has talked has been enthusiastic over the prospects of securing the services of D. S. Beals as a director of their association.

But enthusiasm is not all that it takes to place Mr. Beals in that position. It will take your vote as well, and possibly there will be other candidates for the nomination.

If the prune growers of Oregon are to be financially successful the association is an absolute necessity. During the two years they have been actually engaged in handling and marketing the crop, they have demonstrated the need of such an organization.

The purpose and plan of the association are absolutely correct.

Every prune grower, whether he is a member of the association or not, admits that the organization is the best thing that ever happened to the growers of Oregon.

The first two years of the association were undoubtedly the hardest they will ever have, but at the same time matters will always be coming up which need the far-sighted advice of competent business men and association members can not afford to overlook an opportunity to get such men on their board of directors.

Mr. Beals was active in the organization of the association. He has made numerous trips to Salem in the interests of the local members, both as an individual member himself, and as a director by proxy.

While the editor of the Enterprise is not a member of the association nor a fruit grower, we realize that we live in a country which depends principally on the fruit crop for its existence, and we believe that the association is the one thing that can assure the future of that industry.

Therefore, a successful association is our selfish aim and we believe the election of Mr. Beals to the board of directors will be a long step toward hastening the day of its success.

Tom Cutsforth Is Assistant at U. of O.

Tom Cutsforth, of Riddle, who is quite well known in this county, is now graduate assistant in the psychological department of the University of Oregon. Mr. Cutsforth is blind but his remarkable achievements in spite of this handicap have attracted a great deal of attention from psychologists.

Tom Cutsforth, blind graduate assistant in the psychological department, says it is easier to feel the presence of tall objects than short ones and objects to one side than objects directly in front. This was brought out in his talk before the Hawthorne club, university psychological group, Thursday evening.

His discussion, which was entitled, "The Sixth Sense," included a comparison of the relative abilities of the blind and those who can see in the matter of "sensing" invisible objects. Cutsforth said that Dr. H. H. Wheeler, professor of psychology, with whom he is working to find the basis of the so-called "sixth sense," is more highly "sensitized" than he is, and that the doctor is better able to sense the presence of invisible objects.

"The question has come up time and time again as to what sense or organ is the extra sense, often called the sixth sense," he declared. "Up to this time Dr. Wheeler and I have been unable to come to any definite conclusions, but it is our belief that the ability to feel the presence of invisible objects comes from a mixed sensation originating in the ear and the nerves of the skin and face," he explained.

The latter part of the talk was taken up with a review of the literature of tactual sensation of eiderite and piezoelectric sensation, as written by Dr. Edwin G. Boring, professor of experimental psychology in Clark university.

It was brought out in the review that there is no distinctive piezoelectric and eiderite sensation, which makes the sensation senseless, which means that a nerve is not too sensitive which still remains there, but to the overlapping of other nerves, which lead in from the skin to the sense affected by the absence of the nerve which has been severed.

GOOD GRASS SOD ON ORCHARD

Trees Suffer From Lack of Moisture and There is Temptation to Turn Stock In.

Where there is a good grass sod on the orchard, the trees not only suffer loss of moisture, but there is a constant temptation to turn stock into the orchard during rush times.

Insurance Against Drought Well-Prepared Seed Bed is Recommended and Early Work Will Increase the Yields.

A well-prepared seed bed is good insurance against drought, and the best seed is none too good. A few cents on a dollar saved in the price of seed often costs many dollars in reduced yield.
